2. What a powerful thing it is. It is of such force, that it perverts the ways of judgment. The course of justice is not only obstructed, but turned into injustice; and the greatest wrongs are done, under colour of doing right.

24. Wisdom is before him that hath understanding; but the eyes of a fool are in the ends of the earth.

Note, 1. He is to be reckoned an intelligent man, that not only has wisdom, but has it ready when he has occasion for it. He lays his wisdom before him, as his card and compass which he steers by, has his eye always upon it, as he that writes has on his copy; and then he has it before him, it is not to seek, but still at hand.

2. He that has a giddy head, a roving rambling fancy, will never be fit for any solid business. He is a fool, and good for nothing, whose eyes are in the ends of the earth, here, and there, and every where; any where but where they should be; who cannot fix his thoughts to one subject, nor pursue any one purpose with any thing of steadiness. When his mind should be applied to his study and business, it is filled with a thousand things, foreign and impertinent.

25. A foolish son is a grief to his father, and bitterness to her that bare him.

Observe, 1. Wicked children are an affliction to both their parents. They are an occasion of anger to the father, (so the word signifies,) because they condemn his authority; but of sorrow and bitterness to the mother, because they abuse her tenderness. The parents, being joint-sufferers, should therefore bring mutual comfort to bear them up under it, and strive to make it as easy as they can, the mother to mollify the father's anger, the father to alleviate the mother's grief.

2. That Solomon often repeats this remark, probably, because it was his own case; however, it is a common case.

26. Also to punish the just is not good, nor to strike princes for equity.

In differences that happen between magistrates and subjects, (and such differences often arise,)

1. Let magistrates see to it that they never punish the just, that they be in no case a terror to good works, for that is to abuse their power, and betray that great trust which is reposed in them. It is not good, it is a very evil thing, and will end ill, whatever end they may aim at in it. When princes become tyrants and persecutors, their thrones will be neither easy nor firm.

2. Let subjects see to it that they do not find fault with the government for doing its duty, for it is wrong to strike princes for equity; by defaming their administration, or secretly attempting to strike at them; as the ten tribes that revolted reflected upon Solomon for imposing necessary taxes. Some read it, nor to strike the ingenuous for equity; magistrates must take heed that none suffer under them for well-doing; nor must parents provoke their children to wrath by unjust rebukes.

27. He that hath knowledge spareth his words: and a man of understanding is of an excellent spirit. 28. Even a fool, when he holdeth his peace, is counted wise: and he that shutteth his lips is esteemed a man of understanding.

Two ways a man may shew himself to be a wise man.

1. By the good temper, the sweetness, and the sedateness, of his mind; A man of understanding is of an excellent spirit, a precious spirit, so the word is; he is one that looks well to his spirit, that it be as it should be, and so keeps it in an even frame, easy to himself, and pleasant to others. A gracious spirit is a precious spirit, and renders a man amiable, and more excellent than his neighbour. He is of a cool spirit, so some read it, not heated with passion, nor put into any tumult or disorder by the impetus of any corrupt affection, but even and stayed. A cool head with a warm heart is an admirable composition.

2. By the good government of his tongue.

(1.) A wise man will be of few words, as being afraid of speaking amiss; He that has knowledge, and aims to do good with it, is careful, when he does speak, to speak to the purpose, and therefore says little, that he may take time to deliberate upon it. He spares his words, because they are better spared than ill-spent.

(2.) This is generally taken for such a sure indication of wisdom, that a fool may gain the reputation of being a wise man, if he have but wit enough to hold his tongue, to hear, and see, and say little. If a fool hold his peace, men of candour will think him wise, because nothing appears to the contrary, and because it will be thought that he is making observations on what others say, and gaining experience, and is consulting with himself what he shall say, that he may speak pertinently. See how easy it is to gain men's good opinion, and to impose upon them. But when a fool holds his peace, God knows his heart, and the folly that is bound there; thoughts are words to him, and therefore he cannot be deceived in his judgment of men.

CHAP. XVIII.

1. THROUGH desire a man, having separated himself, seeketh and intermeddleth with all wisdom.

The original here is difficult, and differently understood.

1. Some take it as a rebuke to an affected singularity; When men take a pride in separating themselves from the sentiments and society of others, in contradicting all that has been said before them, and advancing new notions of their own, which, though ever so absurd, they are wedded to, it is to gratify a desire or lust of vain-glory, and they are seekers and meddlers with that which does not belong to them; he seeks according to his desire, and intermeddles with every business, pretends to pass a judgment upon every man's matter; he is morose and supercilious; those generally are so that are opinionative and conceited, and they thus make themselves ridiculous, and are vexations to others.

2. Our translation seems to take it as an excitement to diligence in the pursuit of wisdom. If we would get knowledge and grace, we must desire it, as that which we need, and which will be of great advantage to us, 1 Cor. 12. 31. We must separate ourselves from all those things which would divert us from, or retard us in, the pursuit, retire out of the noise of this world's vanities, and then seek and intermeddle with all the means and instructions of wisdom; be willing to take pains, and try all the methods of improving ourselves; be acquainted with a variety of opinions, that we may prove all things, and hold fast that which is good.

2. A fool hath no delight in understanding, but that his heart may discover itself.

A fool may pretend to understanding, and to seek and intermeddle with the means of it; but,

1. He has no true delight in it; it is only to please his friends, or save his credit, he does not love his book, or his business, or his Bible, or his prayers, he would rather be playing the fool with his sports; those that take no pleasure in learning or religion, will make nothing to purpose of either. No progress is made in them, if they are a task and a drudgery.

2. He has no good design in it, only that his heart may discover itself, that he may have something to make a shew with, something wherewith to varnish his folly, that that may pass off the better, because he loves to hear himself talk.

3. When the wicked cometh, then cometh also contempt, and with ignominy reproach.

This may include a double sense;

1. That wicked people are scornful people, and put contempt upon others; When the wicked comes into any company, comes into the schools of wisdom, or into the assemblies for religious worship, then comes contempt of God, of his people and ministers, and of every thing that is said and done. You can expect no other from those that are profane than that they will be scoffers; they will be an ignominy and reproach, they will flout and jeer every thing that is serious and grave; but let not wise and good men regard it, for the proverb of the ancients says, Such wickedness proceeds from the wicked.

2. That wicked people are shameful people, and bring contempt upon themselves, for God has said, that those who despise him, shall be lightly esteemed. As soon as ever sin entered, shame followed it, and sinners make themselves despicable. Nor do they only draw contempt upon themselves, but they bring ignominy and reproach upon their families, their friends, their ministers, and all that are any way related to them. Those therefore who would secure their honour must retain their virtue.

4. The words of a man's mouth are as deep waters, and the well-spring of wisdom as a flowing brook.

The similitudes here seem to be elegantly transposed.

1. The well-spring of wisdom is as deep waters; an intelligent knowing man has in him a good treasure of useful things, which furnishes him with something to say upon all occasions, that is pertinent and profitable. This is as deep waters which make no noise, but never run dry.

2. The words of such a man's mouth are as a flowing brook; what he sees cause to speak, flows naturally from him, and with a great deal of ease, and freedom, and natural fluency; it is clean and fresh, it is cleansing and refreshing; from his deep waters there flows what there is occasion for, to water those about him, as the brooks do the low grounds.

5. It is not good to accept the person of the wicked, to overthrow the righteous in judgment.

This justly condemns those who, being employed in the administration of justice, pervert judgment,

1. By conniving at men's crimes, and protecting and countenancing them in oppression and violence, because of their dignity and wealth, or some personal kindness they have for them; What-ever excuses men may make for it, certainly it is not good thus to accept the person of the wicked, it is an offence to God, an affront to justice, a wrong to mankind, and a real service done to the kingdom of sin and Satan. The merits of the cause must be regarded, not the person.

2. By giving a cause against justice and equity, because the person is poor, and low in the world, or not of the same party or persuasion, or a stranger of another country; this is overthrowing the righteous in judgment, who ought to be supported, and whom God will make to stand.

6. A fool's lips enter into contention, and his mouth calleth for strokes. 7. A fool's mouth is his destruction, and his lips are the snare of his soul.

Solomon has often shewed what mischief bad men do to others with their ungoverned tongues; here he shews what mischief they do to themselves.

1. They embroil themselves in quarrels; A fool's lips, without any cause or call, enter into contention, by advancing foolish notions, which others find themselves obliged to oppose, and so a quarrel is begun; or by giving provoking language, which will be resented, and satisfaction demanded; or by setting men at defiance, and bidding them do if they dare. Proud and passionate men, and drunkards, are fools, whose lips enter into contention. A wise man may, against his will, be drawn into a quarrel, but he is a fool that of choice enters into it when he might avoid it, and he will repent it when it is too late.

2. They expose themselves to correction; The fool's mouth does, in effect, call for strokes; he has said that which deserves to be punished with strokes, and is still saying that which needs to be checked, and restrained with strokes, as Ananias unjustly commanded that Paul should be smitten on the mouth.

3. They involve themselves in ruin; A fool's mouth, which has been, or would have been, the destruction of others, proves at length his own destruction, perhaps from men; Shimei's mouth was his own destruction, and Adonijah's, who spake against his own head; and when a fool, by his foolish speaking, has run himself into a premunire, and thinks to bring himself off by justifying or excusing what he has said, his defence proves his offence, and his lips are still the snare of his soul, entangling him yet more and more. However, when men by their evil words shall be condemned at God's bar, their mouths will be their destruction, and it will be such an aggravation of their ruin, as will not admit one drop of water, one drop of comfort, to cool their tongue, which is their snare, and will be their tormentor.

8. The words of a tale-bearer are as wounds, and they go down into the innermost parts of the belly.

Tale-bearers are those who secretly carry stories from house to house, which perhaps have some truth in them, but are secrets not fit to be told, or are basely misrepresented, and false colours put upon them, and are all told with design to blast men's reputation, to break their friendship, to make mischief between relations and neighbours, and set them at variance: now the words of such are here said to be,

1. Like as when men are wounded, so the margin reads it; they take on them to be very much affected with the miscarriages of such and such, and to be in pain for them, and pretend that it is with the greatest grief and reluctance imaginable that they speak of them, they look as if they themselves were wounded by it; whereas really they rejoice in iniquity, are fond of the story, and tell it with pride and pleasure. Thus their words seem; but they go down as poison into the innermost parts of the belly, the pill being thus gilded, thus sugared.

2. As wounds, so the text reads it; as deep wounds, deadly wounds, wounds in the innermost parts of the belly; the venter medius vel infimus—The middle or lower belly, the thorax, or the abdomen, in either of which wounds are mortal. The words of the tale-bearer wound him of whom they are spoken, his credit and interest, and him to whom they are spoken, his love and charity; they occasion sin to him, which is a wound to the conscience; perhaps he seems to slight them, but they wound insensibly, by alienating his affections from one he ought to love.

9. He also that is slothful in his work is brother to him that is a great waster.

Note, 1. Prodigality is very bad husbandry. Those are not only justly branded as fools among men, but will give an uncomfortable account to God of the talents they are intrusted with, who are wasters of their estates, who live above what they have, spend and give more than they can afford, and so, in effect, throw away what they have, and suffer it to run to waste.

2. Idleness is no better. He that is remiss in his work, whose hands hang down, (so the word signifies,) that stands, as we say, with his thumbs in his mouth, that neglects his business, does it not at all, or as if he did it not, he is own brother to him that is a prodigal; he is as much a fool, and in as sure and ready a way to poverty; one scatters what he has, the other lets it run through his fingers. The observation is too true, in the affairs of religion; he that is trifling and careless in praying and hearing, is brother to him that does not pray or hear at all; and omissions of duty and in duty, are as fatal to the soul as commissions of sin.

10. The name of the LORD is a strong tower: the righteous runneth into it, and is safe.

Here is, 1. God's sufficiency for the saints; His name is a strong tower for them, in which they may take rest where they are weary, and take sanctuary when they are pursued, where they may be lifted up above their enemies, and fortified against them. There is enough in God, and in the discoveries which he has made of himself to us, to make us easy at all times; the wealth laid up in this tower is enough to enrich them, to be a continual feast, and a continuing treasure, to them; the strength of this tower is enough to protect them; the name of the Lord is all that whereby he has made himself known as God, and our God, not only his titles and attributes, but his covenant and all the promises of it, these make up a tower, a strong tower, impenetrable, impregnable, for all God's people.

2. The saints' security in God. It is a strong tower to those who know how to make use of it as such; the righteous, by faith and prayer, devotion toward God, and dependence on him, run into it as their city of refuge; having made sure their interest in God's name, they take the comfort and benefit of it; they go out of themselves, retire from the world, live above, dwell in God, and God in them, and so they are safe, they think themselves so, and they shall find themselves so.

11. The rich man's wealth is his strong city, and as an high wall in his own conceit.

Having described the firm and faithful defence of the righteous man, (v. 10.) he here shews what is the false and deceitful defence of the rich man, that has his portion and treasure in the things of this world, and sets his heart upon them; his wealth is as much his confidence, and he expects as much from it, as a godly man from his God.

See, 1. How he supports himself; he makes his wealth his city, where he dwells, where he rules, with a great deal of self-complacency, as if he had a whole city under his command. It is his strong city, in which he intrenches himself, and then sets danger at defiance, as if nothing could hurt him. His scales are his pride; his wealth is his wall in which he incloses himself, and he thinks it a high wall which cannot be scaled or got over, Job, 31. 24. Rev. 18. 7.

2. How herein he cheats himself; it is a strong city, and a high wall, but it is so only in his own conceit, it will not prove to be really so, but, like the house built on the sand, it will fail the builder when he most needs it.

12. Before destruction the heart of man is haughty, and before honour is humility.

Note, 1. Pride is the presage of ruin, and ruin will at last be the punishment of pride; for before destruction men are commonly so infatuated by the just judgment of God, that they are more haughty than ever; that their ruin may be the sorer, and the more surprising. Or, if that do not always hold, yet, after the heart has been lifted up with pride, a fall comes, ch. 16. 18.

2. Humility is the presage of honour, and prepares men for it, and honour shall at length be the reward of humility, as he had said before, ch. 15. 33. That has need to be often said which men are so loath to believe.

13. He that answereth a matter before he heareth it, it is folly and shame unto him.

See here how men often expose themselves by that very thing by which they hope to gain applause.

1. Some take a pride in being quick; they answer a matter before they hear it, hear it out, nay, as soon as they but hear of it. They think it is their honour to take up a cause suddenly; and, when they have heard one side, they think the matter so plain, that they need not trouble themselves to hear the other, they are already apprized of it, and masters of all the merits of the cause. Whereas, though a ready wit is an agreeable thing to play with, it is solid judgment and sound wisdom that do business.

2. Those that take a pride in being quick, commonly fall under the just reproach of being impertinent. It is folly for a man to go about to speak to a thing which he does not understand, or to pass sentence upon a matter which he is not truly and fully informed of, and has not patience to make a strict inquiry into; and if it be folly, it is, and will be, shame.

14. The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity; but a wounded spirit who can bear?

Note, 1. Outward grievances are tolerable as long as the mind enjoys itself, and is at ease. Many infirmities, many calamities, we are liable to in this world, in body, name, and estate, which a man may bear, and bear up under, if he have but good conduct and courage, and be able to act with reason and resolution, especially if he have a good conscience, and the testimony of that be for him; and if the spirit of a man will sustain the infirmity, much more will the spirit of a Christian, or rather the Spirit of God, witnessing and working with our spirits in a day of trouble.

2. The grievances of the spirit are of all others most heavy and hardly to be borne; these make sore the shoulders which should sustain the other infirmities. If the spirit be wounded by the disturbance of the reason, dejection under the trouble, whatever it is, and despair of relief; if the spirit be wounded by the amazing apprehensions of God's wrath for sin, and the fearful expectations of judgment and fiery indignation, who can bear this? Wounded spirits cannot help themselves, nor do others know how to help them. It is therefore wisdom to keep conscience void of offence.

15. The heart of the prudent getteth knowledge; and the ear of the wise seeketh knowledge.

Note, 1. Those that are prudent will seek knowledge, and apply their ear and heart to the pursuit of it; their ear to attend to the means of knowledge, and their heart to mix faith with what they hear, and make a good improvement of it. Those that are prudent do not think they have prudence enough, but still see they have need of more; and the more prudent a man is, the more inquisitive will he be after knowledge, the knowledge of God and his duty, and the way to heaven, for that is the best knowledge.

2. Those that prudently seek knowledge shall certainly get knowledge, for God never said to such, Seek, in vain. Seek, and ye shall find. If the ear seeks it, the heart gets it, and keeps it, and is enriched by it. We must get knowledge, not only into our heads, but into our hearts, get the savour and relish of it, apply what we know to ourselves, and experience the power and influence of it.

16. A man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men.

Of what great force gifts, bribes, are, he had intimated before, ch. 17. 8, 23. Here he shews the power of gifts, presents, made even by inferiors to those that are above them, and have much more than they have. A good present will go far,

1. Towards a man's liberty; a man's gift, if he be in prison, may procure his enlargement; there are courtiers, who, if they use their interest even for oppressed innocency, expect to be gratified for it. Or, if a mean man know not how to get access to a great man, he may do it by a fee to his servants, or a present to himself; those will make room for him.

2. Toward his preferment. It will bring him to sit among great men in honour and power. See how corrupt this world is, when men's gifts will do that for them which their merits will not do, though ever so great; nay, will gain that for them which they are unworthy of, and unfit for; and no wonder that those take bribes in their offices, who gave bribes for them. Vendere jura potest, emerat ille prius—He that bought law, can sell it.

17. He that is first in his own cause seemeth just: but his neighbour cometh and searcheth him.

This shews that one tale is good till another is told.

1. He that speaks first will be sure to tell a straight story, and relate that only which makes for him, and put the best colour he can upon it, so that his cause shall appear good, whether it really be so or no.

2. The plaintiff having done his evidence, it is fit that the defendant should be heard, should have leave to confront the witnesses, and cross-examine them, and shew the falsehood and fallacy of what has been alleged, which, perhaps, may make the matter appear quite otherwise than it did. We must therefore remember that we have two ears, to hear each side before we give judgment.

18. The lot causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty.

Note, 1. Contentions commonly happen among the mighty, that are jealous for their honour and right, and stand upon the punctilios of both, and are confident of their being able to make their part good, and therefore will hardly condescend to the necessary terms of an accommodation; whereas those that are poor are forced to be peaceable, and sit down losers.

2. Even the contentions of the mighty may be ended by lot, if they cannot otherwise be compromised, and sometimes better so than by arguments which are endless, or concessions which they are loath to stoop to, whereas it is no disparagement to a man to acquiesce in the determination of the lot, when once it is referred to that. To prevent quarrels, Canaan was divided by lot; and, if lusty lots had not profaned this way of appeal to Providence, perhaps it might be very well used now for the deciding of many controversies, both to the honour of God, and the satisfaction of the parties, provided it be done with prayer and due solemnity; this, and some other scriptures, seeming to direct to it, especially Acts, 1. 26. If the law is a lottery, (as some have called it,) it were as well that a lottery were the law.

19. A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city; and their contentions are like the bars of a castle.

Note, 1. Great care must be taken to prevent quarrels among relations, and those that are under special obligation to each other, not only because they are most unnatural and unbecoming, but because between such, things are commonly taken most unkindly, and resentments are apt to be carried too far. Wisdom and grace would indeed make it most easy to us to forgive our relations and friends, if they offend us, but corruption makes it most difficult to forgive them; let us therefore take heed of disobliging a brother, or one that has been as a brother; ingratitude is very provoking.

2. Great pains must be taken to compromise matters in variance between relations, with all speed, because it is a work of so much difficulty, and, consequently, the more honourable if it be done. Esau was a brother offended, and seemed harder to be won than a strong city, yet, by a work of God upon his heart, in answer to Jacob's prayer, he was won.

20. A man's belly shall be satisfied with the fruit of his mouth; and with the increase of his lips shall he be filled.

Note, 1. Our comfort depends very much upon the testimony of our own consciences, for us, or against us. The belly is here put for the conscience, as ch. 20. 27. Now it is of great consequence to us whether that be satisfied, and what that is filled with, for, accordingly, will our satisfaction be, and our inward peace.

2. The testimony of our consciences will be for us, or against us, according as we have, or have not, governed our tongues well. According as the fruit of the mouth is, good or bad, unto iniquity or unto righteousness, accordingly the character of the man is, and, consequently, the testimony of his conscience concerning him. "We ought to take as great care about the words we speak, as we do about the fruit of our trees, or the increase of the earth, which we are to eat; for, according as they are wholesome or unwholesome, so will the pleasure or the pain be, wherewith we shall be filled." See Bishop Patrick.

21. Death and life are in the power of the tongue; and they that love it shall eat the fruit thereof.

Note, 1. A man may do a great deal of good, or a great deal of hurt, both to others and to himself, according to the use he makes of his tongue. Many a one has been his own death by a foul tongue, or the death of others by a false tongue; and, on the contrary, many a one has saved his own life, or procured the comfort of it, by a prudent gentle tongue, and saved the lives of others by a seasonable testimony or intercession for them. And if by our words we must be justified or condemned, death and life are, no doubt, in the power of the tongue. Tongues were Æsop's best meat, and his worst.

2. Men's words will be judged of by the affections with which they speak; he that not only speaks aright, (which a bad man may do to save his credit, or please his company,) but loves to speak so, speaks well of choice, and with delight, to him it will be life; and he that not only speaks amiss, (which a good man may do through inadvertency,) but loves to speak so, (Ps. 52. 4.) to him it will be death. As men love it, they shall eat the fruit of it.

22. Whoso findeth a wife findeth a good thing, and obtaineth favour of the LORD.

Note, 1. A good wife is a great blessing to a man. He that finds a wife, that is, a wife indeed, (a bad wife does not deserve to be called by a name of so much honour,) that finds a help meet for him, that is a wife in the original acceptation of the word, that sought such a one with care and prayer, and has found what he sought, he has found a good thing, a jewel of great value, a rare jewel, he has found that which will not only contribute more than any thing to his comfort in this life, but will forward him in the way to heaven.

2. God is to be acknowledged in it with thankfulness; it is a token of his favour, and a happy pledge of further favours; it is a sign that God delights in a man to do him good, and has mercy in store for him; for this, therefore, God must be sought unto.

23. The poor useth entreaties; but the rich answereth roughly.

Note, 1. Poverty, though many inconveniencies to the body attend it, has often a good effect upon the spirit, for it makes men humble and submissive, and mortifies their pride; it teaches them to use entreaties; when necessity forces men to beg, it tells them they must not prescribe or demand, but take what is given them, and be thankful. At the throne of God's grace we are all poor, and must use entreaties; not answer, but make application, must sue sub forma pauperis—as a pauper.

2. A prosperous condition, though it has many advantages, has often this mischief attending it, that it makes men proud, haughty, and imperious; The rich answers the entreaties of the poor roughly, as Nabal answered David's messengers with railing. It is a very foolish humour of some rich men, especially those who have risen from little, that they think their riches will warrant them to give hard words, and, even where they do not design any rough dealing, that it becomes them to answer roughly, whereas gentlemen ought to be gentle, Jam. 3. 17.

24. A man that hath friends must shew himself friendly; and there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.

Solomon here recommends friendship to us, and shews,

1. What we must do, that we may contract and cultivate friendship; we must shew ourselves friendly. Would we have friends and keep them, we must not only not affront them, or quarrel with them, but we must love them, and make it appear that we do so, by all expressions that are endearing; by being free with them, pleasing to them, visiting them, and bidding them welcome, and especially by doing all the good offices we can, and serving them in every thing that lies in our power; that is shewing ourselves friendly.

Si vis amari, ama—

If you wish to gain affection, bestow it. SEN.

Ut ameris, amabilis esto—

The way to be beloved, is to be lovely. OVID.

2. That it is worth while to do so, for we may promise ourselves a great deal of comfort in a true friend; A brother indeed is born for adversity, as he had said, ch. 17. 17. In our troubles, we expect comfort and relief from our relations, but sometimes there is a friend that is nothing akin to us, the bonds of whose esteem and love prove stronger than those of nature, and therefore he sticks closer than a brother, and, when it comes to the trial, will do more for us than a brother will. Christ is a Friend to all believers, that sticks closer than a brother; to him therefore let them shew themselves friendly.

CHAP. XIX.

1. BETTER is the poor that walketh in his integrity, than he that is perverse in his lips, and is a fool.

Here see, 1. What will be the credit and comfort of a poor man, and make him more excellent than his neighbour, though his poverty may expose him to contempt, and may dispirit him. Let him be honest, and walk in integrity, let him keep a good conscience, and make it appear that he does so, let him always speak and act with sincerity, when he is under the greatest temptations to dissemble, and break his word, and then let him value himself upon that, for all wise and good men will value him. He is better, has a better character, is in a better condition, is better beloved, and lives to better purpose, than many a one that looks great, and makes a figure.

2. What will be the shame of a rich man, notwithstanding all his pomp. If he have a shallow head, and an evil tongue, if he is perverse in his lips, and is a fool, if he is a wicked man, and gets what he has by fraud and oppression, he is a fool, and an honest poor man is to be preferred far before him.

2. Also, that the soul be without knowledge, it is not good; and he that hasteth with his feet sinneth.

Two things are here shewed to be of bad consequence,

1. Ignorance; To be without the knowledge of the soul is not good, so some read it. Know we not our own selves, our own hearts? A soul without knowledge is not good; it is a great privilege that we have souls, but if these souls have not knowledge, what the better are we? If man have not understanding, he is as the beasts, Ps. 49. 20. An ignorant soul cannot be a good soul. That the soul be without knowledge, is not safe, nor pleasant; what good can the soul do, or what is it good for, if it be without knowledge?

2. Rashness; He that hasteth with his feet, that does things inconsiderately, and with precipitation, and will not take time to ponder the path of his feet, sins; he cannot but miss it often, and take many a false step, which those prevent that consider their ways. As good not know, as not consider.

3. The foolishness of man perverteth his way: and his heart fretteth against the LORD.

We have here two instances of men's folly.

1. That they bring themselves into straits and troubles, and run themselves a-ground, and embarrass themselves; The foolishness of man perverts his way. Men meet with crosses and disappointments in their affairs, and things do not succeed as they expected and wished, and it is their own fault, and their own folly; it is their own iniquity that corrects them.

2. That, when they have done so, they lay the blame upon God, and their hearts fret against him, as if he had done them wrong, whereas really they wrong themselves. In fretting, we are enemies to our own peace, and become self-tormentors; in fretting against the Lord, we affront him, his justice, goodness, and sovereignty; but it is very absurd to take occasion, from the trouble which we pull upon our own heads by our wilfulness, or neglect, to quarrel with him, when we ought to blame ourselves, for it is our own doing. See Isa. 50. 1.

4. Wealth maketh many friends; but the poor is separated from his neighbour.

Here, 1. We may see how strong is men's love of money, that they will love any man, how undeserving soever he be otherwise, if he has but a deal of money, and is free with it, so that they may hope to be the better for it. Wealth enables a man to send many presents, make many entertainments, and do many good offices, and so gains him many friends, who pretend to love him, for they flatter him, and make their court to him, but really love what he has; or rather love themselves, hoping to get by him.

2. We may see how weak is men's love of one another; He who, while he prospered, was loved and respected, if he fall into poverty, is separated from his neighbour, is not owned or looked upon, not visited or regarded, is bid to keep his distance, and told he is troublesome; even one that has been his neighbour and acquaintance, shall turn his face from him, and pass by on the other side; because men's consciences tell them they ought to relieve and succour such, they are willing to have this excuse, that they did not see them.

5. A false witness shall not be unpunished, and he that speaketh lies shall not escape.

Here we have, 1. The sins threatened; bearing false witness in judgment, and speaking lies in common conversation. Men could not arrive at such a pitch of impiety as to bear false witness, (where to the guilt of a lie is added that of perjury and injury,) if they had not advanced to it by allowing themselves to speak untruths in jest and banter, or under pretence of doing good. Thus men teach their tongues to speak lies, Jer. 9. 5. Those that will take a liberty to tell lies in discourse are in a fair way to be guilty of the greater wickedness of false-witness-bearing, whenever they are tempted to it, though they had seemed to detest it. They that can swallow a false word debase their consciences, so that a false oath will not choke them.

2. The threatening itself; they shall not go unpunished, they shall not escape. This intimates, that that which imboldens them in the sin, is, hope of impunity, and that is a sin which commonly escapes punishment from men, though the law was strict, Deut. 19. 13, 19. But it shall not escape the righteous judgment of God, who is jealous, and will not suffer his name to be profaned; we know where all liars will have their everlasting portion.

6. Many will entreat the favour of the prince: and every man is a friend to him that giveth gifts.

7. All the brethren of the poor do hate him: how much more do his friends go far from him! he pursueth them with words, yet they are wanting to him.

These two verses are a comment upon v. 4. and shew,

1. How those that are rich and great are courted and caressed, and have suitors, and servants, in abundance. The prince that has power in his hand, and preferments at his disposal, has his gate and his anti-chamber thronged with petitioners, that are ready to adore him for what they can get; Many will entreat his favour, and think themselves happy in it. Even great men are humble supplicants to the prince. How earnest then should we be for the favour of God, which is far beyond that of any earthly prince! But, it should seem, liberality will go further than majesty itself to gain respect, for they are many that court the prince, but every man is a friend to him that gives gifts; not only those that have received, or do expect, gifts from him, will, as friends, be ready to serve him, but others also will, as friends, give him their good word. Prodigals, who are foolishly free of what they have, will have many hangers-on, who will cry them up as long as it lasts, but will leave them when it is done. Those that are prudently generous make an interest by it, which may stand them in good stead; they are accounted benefactors, exercise an authority which may give them an opportunity of doing good, Luke, 22. 25.

2. How those that are poor and low are slighted and despised. It should not be so, we must honour all men, even under their greatest abasements; men may, if they please, court the prince, and the princely, but they may not trample upon the poor, and look at them with disdain; yet so it often is, All the brethren of the poor do hate him, even his own relations are shy of him, because he is needy and craving, and expects something from them, and because they look upon him as a blemish to their family; and then, no marvel if others of his friends, that were nothing akin to him, go far from him, to get out of his way; he pursues them with words, hoping to prevail with them, by his importunity, to be kind to him, but all in vain, they have nothing for him. They pursue him with words, so some understand it, to excuse themselves from giving him any thing; they tell him that he is idle and impertinent, that he has brought himself into poverty, and therefore ought not to be relieved; as Nabal said to David's messengers, "There are many servants now-a-days, that run away from their masters; and how do I know but that David may be one of them?" Let poor people therefore make God their Friend, pursue him with their prayers, and he will not be wanting to them.

8. He that getteth wisdom loveth his own soul: he that keepeth understanding shall find good.

They are here encouraged,

1. That take pains to get wisdom, to get knowledge and grace, and acquaintance with God; they that do so, shew that they love their own souls, and will be found to have done themselves the greatest kindness imaginable. No man ever hated his own flesh, but loves that, yet many are wanting in love to their own souls, for those only love their souls, and, consequently, love themselves aright, that get wisdom, true wisdom.

2. That take care to keep it when they have got it; it is health, and wealth, and honour, and all, to the soul, and therefore he that keeps understanding, as he shews that he loves his own soul, so he shall certainly find good, all good. He that retains the good lessons he has learnt, and orders his conversation according to them, shall find the benefit and comfort of it in his own soul, and shall be happy here and for ever.

9. A false witness shall not be unpunished, and he that speaketh lies shall perish.

Here is, 1. A repetition of what was said before; (v. 5.) for we have need to be again and again warned of the danger of the sin of lying and false-witness-bearing, since nothing is of more fatal consequence.

2. An addition to it in one word; there it was said, He that speaks lies shall not escape, and intimated that he shall be punished. Here it is said, His punishment shall be such as will be his destruction, he shall perish; the lies he forged against others will be his own ruin. It is a damning, destroying, sin.

10. Delight is not seemly for a fool; much less for a servant to have rule over princes.

Note, 1. Pleasure and liberty ill become a fool; Delight is not seemly for such a one. A man that has not wisdom and grace has no right or title to true joy, and therefore it is unseemly. It ill becomes those, that do not delight in God, to delight in any thing else. They know not how to use any thing, nor how to manage themselves, and therefore they do but expose themselves. It becomes ungracious fools to be afflicted, and mourn, and weep, not to laugh and be merry; rebukes are more proper for them than delights. Delight is seemly for a man of business, to refresh him when he is fatigued, but not for a fool that lives an idle life, and abuses his recreations. The prosperity of fools discovers their folly, and destroys them.

2. Power and honour ill become a man of a servile spirit; nothing is more unseemly than for a servant to have rule over princes; it is absurd in itself, and very preposterous; for none are so insolent and intolerable as a beggar on horse-back, a servant when he reigns, ch. 30. 22. It is very unseemly for one, that is a servant to sin and his lusts, to rule over and oppress those that are God's freemen, and made kings and priests to him.

11. The discretion of a man deferreth his anger; and it is his glory to pass over a transgression.

A wise man will observe these two rules about his anger;

1. Not to be over-hasty in his resentments; Discretion teaches us to defer our anger; to defer the admission of it, till we have thoroughly considered all the merits of the provocation, seen them in a true light, and weighed them in a just balance; and then to defer the prosecution of it, till there be no danger of running into any indecencies. Plato said to his servant, "I would beat thee, but that I am angry." Give it time, and it will cool.

2. Not to be over-critical in his resentments. Whereas it is commonly looked upon as a piece of ingenuity to apprehend an affront quickly, it is here made a man's glory to pass over a transgression, to appear as if he did not see it; (Ps. 38. 13.) or, if he sees fit to take notice of it, yet to forgive it, and meditate no revenge.

12. The king's wrath is as the roaring of a lion; but his favour is as dew upon the grass.

This is to the same purport with what we had, ch. 16. 14, 15. and the design of it is,

1. To make kings wise and considerate in dispensing their frowns and smiles; they are not like those of common persons, their frowns are very terrible, and their smiles very comfortable, and therefore it concerns them to be very careful that they never frighten a good man from doing well, with their frowns, nor ever give countenance to a wicked man in doing ill, with their smiles, for then they abuse their influence, Rom. 13. 3.

2. To make subjects faithful and dutiful to their princes. Let them be restrained from all disloyalty, by the consideration of the dreadful consequence of having the government against them; and let them be encouraged in all good services to the public, by the hopes of the favour of the prince. Christ is a King, whose wrath against his enemies will be as the roaring of a lion, (Rev. 10. 3.) and his favour to his own people as the refreshing dew, Ps. 72. 6.

13. A foolish son is the calamity of his father: and the contentions of a wife are a continual dropping.

It is an instance of the vanity of the world, that we are liable to the greatest griefs in those things wherein we promise ourselves the greatest comfort. It is as it proves. What greater temporal comfort can a man have than a good wife, and good children? Yet,

1. A foolish son is a great affliction, and may make a man wish a thousand times he had been written childless. A son that will apply himself to no study or business, that will take no advice, that lives a lewd, loose, rakish, life, and spends what he has extravagantly, games it away, and wastes it in the excess of riot, or that is proud, foppish, and conceited, such a one is the grief of his father, because he is the disgrace, and is likely to be the ruin, of his family. He hates all his labour, when he sees to whom he must leave the fruit of it.

2. A cross, peevish, wife is as great an affliction; Her contentions are continual; every day, and every hour in the day, she finds some occasion to make herself, and those about her, uneasy. Those that are accustomed to chide, never want something or other to chide at; but it is a continual dropping, that is, a continual vexation, as it is to have a house so much out of repair that it rains in, and a man cannot lie dry in it. That man has an uncomfortable life, and has need of a great deal of wisdom and grace to enable him to bear his affliction, and do his duty, that has a sot to his son, and a scold to his wife.

14. House and riches are the inheritance of fathers; and a prudent wife is from the Lord.

Note, 1. A discreet and virtuous wife is a choice gift of God's providence to a man; a wife that is prudent, in opposition to one that is contentious, v. 13. For though a wife, that is continually finding fault, may think it is her wit and wisdom to be so, it is really her folly; a prudent wife is meek and quiet, and makes the best of every thing. If a man has such a wife, let him not ascribe it to the wisdom of his own choice, or his own management, (for the wisest have been deceived both in and by a woman,) but let him ascribe it to the goodness of God, who made him a help meet for him, and, perhaps, by some hits and turns of providence, that seemed casual, brought her to him. Every creature is what he makes it. Happy marriages, we are sure, are made in heaven; Abraham's servant prayed in the belief of this, Gen. 24. 12.

2. It is a more valuable gift than house and riches, contributes more to the comfort and credit of a man's life, and the welfare of his family, is a greater token of God's favour, and about which the Divine Providence is in a more especial manner conversant. A good estate may be the inheritance of fathers, which, by the common direction of Providence, comes in course to a man; but no man has a good wife by descent or entail. Parents that are worldly, in disposing of their children, look no further than to match them to house and riches, but if withal it was to a prudent wife, let God have the glory.

15. Slothfulness casteth into a deep sleep; and an idle soul shall suffer hunger.

See here the evil of a sluggish, slothful, disposition:

1. It stupifies men, and makes them senseless, and mindless of their own affairs, as if they were cast into a deep sleep, dreaming much, but doing nothing. Slothful people doze away their time, bury their talents, live a useless life, and are the unprofitable burthens of the earth; for any service they do when they are awake they had as good be always asleep. Even their souls are idle, and lulled asleep, their rational powers chilled and frozen.

2. It impoverishes men, and brings them to want; they that will not labour cannot expect to eat, but must suffer hunger; An idle soul, one that is idle in the affairs of his soul, that takes no care or pains to work out his salvation, shall perish for want of that which is necessary to the life and happiness of the soul.

16. He that keepeth the commandment keepeth his own soul; but he that despiseth his ways shall die.

Here is, 1. The happiness of those that walk circumspectly; They that make conscience of keeping the commandment in every thing, that live by rule, as becomes servants and patients, they keep their own souls, they secure their present peace and future bliss, and provide every way well for themselves. If we keep God's word, God's word will keep us from every thing really hurtful.

2. The misery of those that live at large, and never mind what they do; They that despise their ways shall die, shall perish eternally, they are in the high road to ruin. With respect to those that are careless about the end of their ways, and never consider whither they are going, and about the rule of their ways, that will walk in the way of their hearts, and after the course of the world, (Ecc. 11. 9.) that never consider what they have done, or what they are concerned to do, but walk at all adventures, (Lev. 26. 21.) right or wrong, it is all one to them; what can come of this but the greatest mischief?

17. He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the LORD; and that which he hath given will he pay him again.

Here is, 1. The duty of charity described. It includes two things: (1.) Compassion; which is the inward principle of charity in the heart; it is to have pity on the poor; those that have not a penny for the poor, yet may have pity for them, a charitable concern and sympathy; and if a man give all his goods to feed the poor, and have not this charity in his heart, it is nothing, 1 Cor. 13. 3. We must draw out our souls to the hungry, Isa. 58. 10. (2.) Bounty and liberality. We must not only pity the poor, but give, according to their necessity and our ability, Jam. 2. 15. 16. That which he has given. Margin, His deed. It is charity to do for the poor, as well as to give; and thus, if they have their limbs and senses, they may be charitable to one another.

2. The encouragement of charity. (1.) A very kind construction shall be put upon it; What is given to the poor, or done for them, God will place it to account as lent to him, lent upon interest, so the word signifies; he takes it kindly, as if it were done to himself, and he would have us to take the comfort of it, and to be as well pleased as ever any usurer was when he had let out a sum of money into good hands. (2.) A very rich recompence shall be made for it; he will pay him again, in temporal, spiritual, and eternal, blessings. Almsgiving is the surest and safest way of thriving.

18. Chasten thy son while there is hope, and let not thy soul spare for his crying.

Parents are here cautioned against a foolish indulgence of their children, that are untoward and viciously inclined, and that discover such an ill temper of mind as is not likely to be cured but by severity.

1. Do not say, that it is all in good time to correct them; no, as soon as ever there appears a corrupt disposition in them, check it immediately, before it gets head, and takes root, and is hardened into a habit; Chasten thy son while there is hope, for, perhaps, if he be let alone a while, he will be past hope, and a much greater chastening will not do that which now a less would effect. It is easiest plucking up weeds as soon as they spring up, and the bullock that is designed for the yoke should be betimes accustomed to it.

2. Do not say, that it is a pity to correct them, and that because they cry, and beg to be forgiven, you cannot find in your heart to do it; if the point will be gained without correction, well and good; but if you find, as it often proves, that your forgiving them once, upon a dissembled repentance, and promise of amendment, does but embolden them to offend again, especially, if it be a thing that is in itself sinful, as lying, swearing, ribaldry, stealing, or the like; in such a case, put on resolution, and let not thy soul spare for his crying. It is better that he should cry under thy rod, than under the sword of the magistrate, or, which is more fearful, that of divine vengeance.

19. A man of great wrath shall suffer punishment; for if thou deliver him, yet thou must do it again.

1. As we read this, it intimates, in short, that angry men never want woe; those that are of strong, or rather headstrong, passions, commonly bring themselves, and their families, into trouble by vexatious suits and quarrels, and the provocations they give; they are still smarting, in one instance or other, for their ungoverned heats; and if their friends deliver them out of one trouble, they will quickly involve themselves in another, and they must do it again; all which trouble to themselves and others would be prevented if they would mortify their passions, and get the rule of their own spirits.

2. It may as well be read, He that is of great wrath, meaning the child that is to be corrected, and is impatient of rebuke, cries, and makes a noise, even that wrath of his against the rod of correction deserves to be punished; for if thou deliver him for the sake of that, thou wilt be forced to punish him so much the more the next time. A stomachful, high-spirited, child, must be subdued betimes, or it will be the worse for it.

20. Hear counsel, and receive instruction, that thou mayest be wise in thy latter end.

Note, 1. It is well with those that are wise in their latter end, wise for their latter end, for their future state, for another world, that are found wise when their latter end comes; wise virgins, wise builders, wise stewards; that are wise at length, and understand the things that belong to their peace, before they be hid from their eyes. A carnal worldling, at his end, shall be a fool, (Jer. 17. 11.) but godliness will prove wisdom at last.

2. Those that would be wise in their latter end must hear counsel, and receive instruction, in their beginnings must be willing to be taught and ruled, willing to be advised and reprov'd, when they are young. Those that would be stored in winter must gather in summer.

21. There are many devices in a man's heart; nevertheless the counsel of the LORD, that shall stand.

Here is, 1. Men projecting. They keep their designs to themselves, but they cannot hide them from God, he knows the many devices that are in men's hearts, devices against his counsel, as those, Ps. 2. 1. . 3. Micah, 4. 11. devices without his counsel, no regard had to his providence, as those, James, 4. 13. This and the other they will do, and not take God along with them; devices unlike God's counsels; men are wavering in their devices, and often absurd and unjust, but God's counsels are wise and holy, steady and uniform.

2. God over-ruling. Various men have various designs, according as their inclination and interest leads them, but the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand, whatever comes of the devices of men. His counsel often breaks men's measures, and baffles their devices; but their devices cannot in the least alter his counsel, or disturb the proceedings of it, or put him upon new counsels, Isa. 14. 24.—46. 11. What a check does this give to politic, designing, men, who think they can outwit all mankind, that there is a God in heaven, that laughs at them! Ps. 2. 4. What comfort does this speak to all God's people, that all God's purposes, which, we are sure, are right and good, shall be accomplished in due time!

22. The desire of a man is his kindness: and a poor man is better than a liar.

Note, 1. The honour of doing good is what we may laudably be ambitious of. It cannot but be the desire of a man, if he have any spark of virtue in him, to be kind; one would not covet an estate for any thing so much as thereby to be put into a capacity of relieving the poor, and obliging our friends.

2. It is far better to have a heart to do good, and want ability for it, than have ability for it, and want a heart to it; The desire of a man to be kind, and charitable, and generous, is his kindness, and shall be so construed; both God and man will accept his good-will, according to what he has, and will not expect more. A poor man, who wishes you well, but can promise you nothing, because he has nothing to be kind with, is better than a liar, than a rich man, who makes you believe he will do mighty things, but, when it comes to the setting to, will do nothing. The character of the men of low degree, that they are vanity, from whom nothing is expected, is better than that of men of high degree, that they are a lie, they deceive those whose expectations they raised.

23. The fear of the LORD tendeth to life: and he that hath it shall abide satisfied; he shall not be visited with evil.

See what they get by it, that live in the fear of God, and always make conscience of their duty to him.

1. Safety: They shall not be visited with evil; they may be visited with sickness, or other afflictions, but there shall be no evil in them, nothing to hurt them, because nothing to separate them from the love of God, or to hurt the soul.

2. Satisfaction; They shall abide satisfied; they shall have those comforts which are satisfying, and shall have a constant contentment and complacency in them. It is a satisfaction which will abide, whereas all the satisfactions of sense are transient, and soon gone. Satur pernoctabit, non cubabit incarnatus—He shall not go supperless to bed; he shall have that which will make him easy, and be an entertainment to him in his silent and solitary hours, Ps. 16. 6, 7.

3. True and complete happiness; Serious godliness has a direct tendency to life, to all good, to eternal life; it is the sure and ready way to it; there is something in the nature of it, fitting men for heaven, and so leading them to it.

24. A slothful man hideth his hand in his bosom, and will not so much as bring it to his mouth again.

A sluggard is here exposed as a fool, for,

1. All his care is to save himself from labour and cold. See his posture; He hides his hand in his bosom, pretends he is lame, and cannot work; his hands are cold, and he must warm them in his bosom; and, when they are warm there, he must keep them so. He hugs himself in his own ease, and is resolved against labour and hardship. Let those work that love it; for his part, he thinks there is no such fine life as sitting still and doing nothing.

2. He will not be at the pains to feed himself; an elegant hyperbole; as we say, A man is so lazy, that he would not shake fire off him; so here, He cannot find in his heart to take his hand out of his bosom, no, not to put meat into his own mouth. If the law be so, that those that will not labour must not eat, he will rather starve than stir: thus his sin is his punishment, and therefore is egregious folly.

25. Smite a scorner, and the simple will beware: and reprove one that hath understanding, and he will understand knowledge.

Note, 1. The punishment of scorners will be a means of good to others. When men are so hardened in wickedness, that they will not themselves be wrought upon by the severe methods that are used to reclaim and reform them, yet such methods must be used for the sake of others, that they may hear and fear, Deut. 19. 20. If the scorner will not be recovered from his sin, the disease being inveterate, yet the simple will beware of venturing upon the sin which exposes men thus. If it cure not the infected, it may prevent the spreading of the infection.

2. The reproof of wise men will be a means of good to themselves; they need not be smitten; a word to the wise is enough. Do but reprove one that has understanding, and he will so far understand himself and his own interest, that he will understand knowledge by it, and not miss it again, through ignorance and inadvertence, when once he has been told of it; so kindly does he take reproof, and so wisely improve it.

26. He that wasteth his father, and chaseth away his mother, is a son that causeth shame, and bringeth reproach.

Here is, 1. The sin of a prodigal son. Beside the wrong he does to himself, he is injurious to his good parents, and basely ungrateful to them that were the instruments of his being, and have taken so much care and pains about him, which is a great aggravation of his sin, and renders it exceeding sinful in the eyes of God and man; He wastes his father, wastes his estate which he should have to support him in his old age, wastes his spirits, and breaks his heart, and brings his gray head with sorrow to the grave. He chases away his mother, alienates her affections from him, which cannot be done without a great deal of regret and uneasiness to her; he makes her weary of the house, with his rudeness and insolence, and glad to retire for a little quietness; and, when he has spent all, he turns her out of doors.

2. The shame of a prodigal son. It is a shame to himself that he should be so brutish and unnatural; he makes himself odious to all mankind. It is a shame to his parents and family, who are reflected upon, though perhaps without just cause, for teaching him no better, or being some way wanting to him.

27. Cease, my son, to hear the instruction that causeth to err from the words of knowledge.

This is a good caution to those who have had a good education, to take heed of hearkening to those who, under pretence of instructing them, draw them off from those good principles under the influence of which they were trained up. Observe,

1. There is that which seems designed for the instruction, but really tends to the destruction, of young men. The factors for vice will undertake to teach them free thoughts and a fashionable conversation; how to palliate the sins they have a mind to, and stop the mouth of their own consciences; how to get clear of the restraints of their education, and to set up for wits and beaux. This is the instruction which causes to err from the forms of sound words, which should be held fast in faith and love.

2. It is the wisdom of young men to turn a deaf ear to such instructions, as the adder does to the charms that are designed to insnare her. "Dread hearing such talk as tends to instil loose principles into the mind; and if thou art linked in with such, break off from them; thou hast heard enough, or too much, and therefore hear no more, of the evil communication which corrupts good manners."

28. An ungodly witness scorneth judgment: and the mouth of the wicked devoureth iniquity.

Here is a description of the worst of sinners, whose hearts are fully set in them to do evil.

1. They set that at defiance which would deter and detain them from sin; An ungodly witness is one that bears false witness against his neighbour, and will forswear himself to do another a mischief, in which there is not only great injustice, but great impiety; this is one of the worst of men. Or, An ungodly witness is one that profanely and atheistically witnesses against religion and godliness.

whose instructions seduce from the words of knowledge; (v. 27.) such a one scorns judgment, laughs at the terrors of the Lord, mocks at that fear, Job, 15. 26. Tell him of law and equity, that the scriptures and an oath are sacred things, and not to be jested with, that there will come a reckoning day; he laughs at it all, and scorns to heed it.

2. They are greedy, and glad of that which gives them an opportunity to sin; The mouth of the wicked eagerly devours iniquity, drinks it in like water, Job, 15. 16.

29. Judgments are prepared for scorers, and stripes for the back of fools.

Note, 1. Scorers are fools; those that ridicule things sacred and serious, do but make themselves ridiculous; their folly shall be manifest unto all men.

2. Those that scorn judgments cannot escape them, v. 28. The unbelief of man shall not make God's threatenings of no effect; they that devour iniquity swallow the hook with the bait. The civil magistrate has judgments prepared for scorers, for, otherwise, he would bear the sword in vain; but if he be remiss, and connive at sin, yet God's judgments slumber not, they are prepared, Matth. 25. 41.

CHAP. XX.

1. WINE is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise.

Here is, 1. The mischief of drunkenness; Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; it is so to the sinner himself, it mocks him, makes a fool of him, promises him that satisfaction which it can never give him; it smiles upon him at first, but at the last it bites; in reflection upon it, it rages in his conscience; it is raging in the body, puts the humours into a ferment. When the wine is in, the wit is out, and then the man, according as his natural temper is, either mocks like a fool, or rages like a mad man. Drunkenness, which pretends to be a sociable thing, renders men unfit for society, for it makes them abusive with their tongues, and outrageous in their passions, ch. 23. 29.

2. The folly of drunkards is easily inferred thence. He that is deceived thereby, that suffers himself to be drawn into this sin, when he is so plainly warned of the consequences of it, is not wise, he shews that he has no right sense or consideration of things; and not only so, but he renders himself incapable of getting wisdom; for it is a sin that infatuates and besots men, and takes away their heart. A drunkard is a fool, and a fool he is like to be.

2. The fear of a king is as the roaring of a lion: whose provoketh him to anger sinneth against his own soul.

See here, 1. How formidable kings are, and what a terror they strike upon those they are angry with: Their fear, with which (especially when they are absolute, and their will is a law) they keep their subjects in awe, is as the roaring of a lion, which is very dreadful to the creatures he preys upon, and makes them tremble, so that they cannot escape from him. Those princes that rule by wisdom and love, rule like God himself, and bear his image; but those that rule merely by terror, and with a high hand, do but rule like a lion in the forest, with a brutal power. Oderint, dum metuant—Let them hate, provided they fear.

2. How unwise therefore they are that quarrel with them, that are angry at them, and so provoke them to anger; they sin against their own lives; much more do they do so that provoke the King of kings to anger. Nemo me impune lacesset—No one shall provoke me with impunity.

3. It is an honour for a man to cease from strife: but every fool will be meddling.

This is designed to rectify men's mistakes concerning strife.

1. Men think it is their wisdom to engage in quarrels; whereas it is the greatest folly that can be. He thinks himself a wise man that is quick in resenting affronts, that stands upon every nicety of honour and right, and will not abate an ace of either, that prescribes, and imposes, and gives, law, to every body; but he that thus meddles is a fool, and creates a great deal of needless vexation to himself.

2. Men think, when they are engaged in quarrels, that it would be a shame to them to go back, and let fall the weapon; whereas really it is an honour for a man to cease from strife, an honour to withdraw an action, to drop a controversy, to forgive an injury, and to be friends with those that we have fallen out with. It is the honour of a man, a wise man, a man of spirit, to shew the command he has of himself, by ceasing from strife, yielding, and stooping, and receding from his just demands, for peace-sake, as Abraham, the better man, Gen. 13. 8.

4. The sluggard will not plough by reason of the cold; therefore shall he beg in harvest, and have nothing.

See here the evil of slothfulness, and the love of ease.

1. It keeps men from the most necessary business, from ploughing and sowing when the season is; The sluggard has ground to occupy, and has ability for it, he can plough, but he will not, some excuse or other he has to shift it off, but the true reason is, it is cold weather; though ploughing time is not in the depth of winter, it is in the borders of winter, when he thinks it too cold for him to be abroad. Those are scandalously sluggish, who, in the way of their business, cannot find in their hearts to undergo so little toil as that of ploughing, and so little hardship as that of a cold blast. Thus careless are many in the affairs of their souls; a trifling difficulty will frighten them from the most important duty; but good soldiers must endure hardness.

2. Thereby it deprives them of the most necessary supports. They that will not plough in seed-time, cannot expect to reap in harvest; and therefore they must beg their bread with astonishment, when the diligent are bringing home their sheaves with joy. He that will not submit to the labour of ploughing, must submit to the shame of begging; they shall beg in harvest, and yet have nothing; no, not then when there is most plenty. Though it may be charity to relieve sluggards, yet a man may, in justice, not relieve them, they deserve to be left to starve. They that would not provide oil in their vessels, begged when the bridegroom came, and were denied.

5. Counsel in the heart of man is like deep water; but a man of understanding will draw it out.

A man's wisdom is here said to be of use to him, for the pumping of other people, and diving into them;

1. To get the knowledge of them. Though men's counsels and designs are ever so carefully concealed by them, so that they are as deep water which one cannot fathom; yet there are those who, by sly insinuations, and questions that seem foreign, will get out of them both what they have done, and what they intend to do. Those therefore who would keep counsel, must not only put on resolution, but stand upon their guard.

2. To get knowledge by them. Some are very able and fit to give counsel, have an excellent faculty of cleaving a hair, hitting the joint of a difficulty, and advising pertinently; but they are modest, and reserved, and not communicative; they have a great deal in them, but it is loath to come out; in such a case, a man of understanding will draw it out, as wine out of a vessel. We lose the benefit we might have by the conversation of wise men, for want of the art of being inquisitive.

6. Most men will proclaim every one his own goodness: but a faithful man who can find?

Note, 1. It is easy to find those that will pretend to be good and liberal. Many a man will call himself a man of mercy, will boast what good he has done, and what good he designs to do, or, at least, what an affection he has to we -doing. Most men will talk a great deal of their charity.

will sound a trumpet to themselves, as the Pharisees, and, what little goodness they have, will proclaim it, and make a mighty matter of it.

2. But it is hard to find those that really are kind and liberal; that have done, and will do, more than either they speak of, or care to hear spoken of; that will be a true friend in a strait; such a one as one may trust to is like a black swan.

7. The just man walketh in his integrity: his children are blessed after him.

It is here observed, to the honour of a good man,

1. That he does well for himself; he has a certain rule, which, with an even steady hand, he governs himself by; He walks in his integrity, he keeps a good conscience, and he has the comfort of it, for it is his rejoicing. He is not liable to those uneasinesses, either in contriving what he shall do, or reflecting on what he has done, which they are liable to that walk in deceit.

2. That he does well for his family; His children are blessed after him, and fare the better for his sake; God has mercy in store for the seed of the faithful.

8. A king that sitteth in the throne of judgment scattereth away all evil with his eyes.

Here is, 1. The character of a good governor; He is a king that deserves to be called so, who sits in the throne, not as a throne of honour, to take his ease, and take state upon him, and oblige men to keep their distance, but as a throne of judgment, that he may do justice, right the injured, and punish the injurious; that makes his business his delight, and loves no pleasure comparably to it; that does not devolve the whole care and trouble upon others, but takes cognizance of affairs himself, and sees with his own eyes as much as may be, 1 Kings, 10. 9.

2. The happy effect of a good government. The presence of the prince goes far toward the putting of wickedness out of countenance; if he inspect his affairs himself, those that are employed under him will be kept in awe, and restrained from doing wrong. If great men be good men, and will use their power as they may and ought, what good may they do, and what evil may they prevent!

9. Who can say, I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin?

This question is not only a challenge to any man in the world to prove himself sinless, whatever he pretends, but a lamentation of the corruption of mankind, even that which remains in the best. Alas! Who can say, "I am sinless?" Observe,

1. Who the persons are that are excluded from these pretensions; all, one as well as another. Here, in this imperfect state, no person whatsoever can pretend to be without sin. Adam could say so in innocency, and saints can say so in heaven, but none in this life. Those that think themselves as good as they should be, cannot; nay, and those that are really good, will not, dare not, say this.

2. What the pretension is that is excluded. We cannot say, We have made our hearts clean; though we can say, through grace, "We are cleaner than we have been," yet we cannot say, "We are clean and pure from all remainders of sin;" or, though we are clean from the gross acts of sin, yet we cannot say, "Our hearts are clean;" or, though we are washed and cleansed, yet we cannot say, "We ourselves made our own hearts clean," it was the work of the Spirit; or, though we are pure from the sins of many others, yet we cannot say, "We are pure from our sin, the sin that casily besets us, the body of death which Paul complained of, Rom. 7. 24.

10. Divers weights, and divers measures, both of them are alike abomination to the LORD.

See here, 1. The various arts of deceiving that men have; all which evils the love of money is the root of. In paying and receiving money, which was then commonly done by the scale, they had divers weights, an under-weight for what they paid, and an over-weight for what they received; in delivering out, and taking in, goods, they had divers measures, a scanty measure to sell by, and a large measure to buy by. This was doing wrong with plot and contrivance, and under colour of doing right. Under these is included all manner of fraud and deceit in commerce and trade.

2. The displeasure of God against them; whether they be about the money or the goods in the buyer, or in the seller, they are all alike an abomination to the Lord; he will not prosper the trade that is thus driven, nor bless what is thus got; he hates those that thus break the common faith by which justice is maintained, and will be the Avenger of all such.

11. Even a child is known by his doings, whether his work be pure, and whether it be right.

The tree is known by its fruits, a man by his doings; even a young tree by its first-fruits, a child by his childish things, whether his work be clean only, appearing good, (the word is used ch. 16. 2.) or whether it be right, really good. This intimates,

1. That children will discover themselves; one may soon see what their temper is, and which way their inclination leads them, according as their constitution is. Children have not learned the art of dissembling and concealing their bent, as grown people have.

2. That parents should observe their children, that they may discover their disposition and genius, and both manage them, and dispose of them, accordingly. Drive the nail that will go, and draw out that which goes amiss. Wisdom is herein profitable to direct.

12. The hearing ear, and the seeing eye, the LORD hath made even both of them.

Note, 1. God is the God of nature, and all the powers and faculties of nature are derived from him, and depend upon him, and therefore are to be employed for him. It was he that formed the eye, and planted the ear, (Ps. 94. 9.) and the structure of both is admirable; and it is he that preserves to us the use of both; to his providence we owe it that our eyes are seeing eyes, and our ears hearing ears. Hearing and seeing are the learning senses, and we must particularly own God's goodness in them.

2. God is the God of grace; it is he that gives the ear that hears God's voice, the eye that sees his beauty, for it is he that opens the understanding.

13. Love not sleep, lest thou come to poverty; open thine eyes, and thou shalt be satisfied with bread.

Note, 1. Those that indulge themselves in their ease may expect to want necessities, which should have been gotten by honest labour; "Therefore, though thou must sleep, (nature requires it,) yet love not sleep, as those do that hate business, Love not sleep for its own sake, but only as it fits for farther work. Love not much sleep, but rather grudge the time that is spent in it, and wish thou couldest live without it, that thou mightest always be employed in some good exercise." We must allow it to our bodies as men allow it to their servants, because they cannot help it, and otherwise they shall have no good of them. They that love sleep are likely to come to poverty, not only because they lose the time they spend in excess of sleep, but because they contract a listless, careless, disposition, and are still half asleep, never well awake.

2. Those that stir up themselves to their business may expect to have conveniences; "Open thine eyes, awake, and shake off sleep, see how far in the day it is, how thy work wants thee, and how busy others are about thee! And when thou art awake, look up, look to thine advantages, and do not let slip thine opportunities; apply thy mind closely to thy business, and be in care about it. It is the easy condition of a great advantage; open thine eyes, and thou shalt be satisfied with bread; if thou dost not grow rich yet thou shalt have enough; and that is as good as a feast."

14. It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer: but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth.

See here, 1. What arts men use to get a good bargain, and to buy cheap. They not only cheapen carelessly, as if they had no need, no mind, for the commodity, when, perhaps, they cannot go without it, (there may be prudence in that,) but they vilify and run down that which yet they know to be of value; they cry, "It is naught, it is naught; it has this and the other fault, or perhaps may have; it is not good of the sort; and it is too dear; we can have better and cheaper elsewhere; or have bought better and cheaper." This is the common way of dealing; and after all, it may be, they know the contrary of what they affirm; but the buyer may think he has no other way of being even with the seller, who does as extravagantly commend his goods, and justify the price he sets on them; and so there is a fault on both sides; whereas the bargain would be made every jot as well, if both buyer and seller would be modest, and speak as they think.

2. What pride and pleasure men take in a good bargain, when they have got it, though therein they contradict themselves, and own they dissembled when they were driving the bargain; when he has beaten down the seller, who was content to lower his price rather than lose a customer, (as many poor tradesmen are forced to do, small profit is better than none,) then he goes his way, and boasts what excellent goods he has got at his own price, and takes it as an affront and a reflection upon his judgment if any body disparages his bargain. Perhaps he knew the worth of the goods better than the seller himself did, and knows how to get a great deal by them. See how apt men are to be pleased with their gettings, and proud of their tricks; whereas a fraud and a lie are what a man ought to be ashamed of, though he have gained ever so much by them.

15. There is gold, and a multitude of rubies: but the lips of knowledge are a precious jewel.

The lips of knowledge (a good understanding to guide the lips, and a good elocution to diffuse the knowledge) are to be preferred far before gold, and pearl, and rubies; for,

1. They are more rare in themselves, more scarce, and hard to be got. There is gold in many a man's pocket, that has no grace in his heart. In Solomon's time there was plenty of gold, (1 Kings, 10. 21.) and abundance of rubies, every body wore them, they were to be bought in every town; but wisdom is a rare thing, a precious jewel, few have it so as to do good with it, nor is it to be purchased of the merchants.

2. They are more enriching to us, and more adorning. They make us rich toward God, rich in good works, 1 Tim. 2. 9, 10. Most people are fond of gold, and a ruby or two will not serve, they must have a multitude of them, a cabinet of jewels, but he that has the lips of knowledge despises these, because he knows and possesses better things.

16. Take his garment that is surety for a stranger: and take a pledge of him for a strange woman.

Two sorts of persons are here spoken of, that are ruining their own estates, and will be beggars shortly, and therefore are not to be trusted without good security.

1. Those that will be bound for any body that will ask them, that entangle themselves in rash suretiship, to oblige their idle companions; they will break at last, nay, they cannot hold out long; these waste by wholesale.

2. Those that are in league with abandoned women, that treat them, and court them, and keep company with them; they will be beggars in a little time, never give them credit without a good pawn. Strange women have strange ways of impoverishing men, to enrich themselves.

17. Bread of deceit is sweet to a man; but afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel.

Note, 1. Sin may be pleasant in the commission; Bread of deceit, wealth gotten by fraud, by lying and oppression, may be sweet to a man, and the more sweet for its being ill-gotten; such pleasure does the carnal mind take in the success of its wicked projects. All the pleasures and profits of sin are bread of deceit, they are stolen, for they are forbidden fruit, and they will deceive men, for they are not what they promise. For a time, however, they are rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel, and the sinner blesses himself in them.

But, 2. It will be bitter in the reflection. Afterward, the sinner's mouth shall be filled with gravel; when his conscience is awakened, when he sees himself cheated, and becomes apprehensive of the wrath of God against him for this sin, how painful and uneasy then is the thought of it! The pleasures of sin are but for a season, and are succeeded with sorrows. Some nations have punished malefactors by mingling gravel with their bread.

18. Every purpose is established by counsel: and with good advice make war.

Note, 1. It is good in every thing to act with deliberation, and to consult with ourselves at least, and, in matters of moment, with our friends too, before we determine, but especially to ask counsel of God, and beg direction from him, and observe the guidance of his eye. This is the way to have both our minds and our purposes established, and to succeed well in our affairs; whereas what is done hastily and with precipitation, is repented of at leisure. Take time, and you will have done the sooner. Deliberandum est diu, quod statuendum est semel—A final decision should be preceded by mature deliberation.

2. It is especially our wisdom to be cautious in making war; consider, and take advice, whether the war should be begun or no, whether it be just, whether it be prudent, whether we be a match for the enemy, and able to carry it on when it is too late to retreat; (Luke, 14. 31.) and, when it is begun, how, and by what arts, it may be prosecuted, for skill is as necessary as courage. Going to law is a kind of going to war, and, therefore, must be done with good advice, Prov. 25. 8. The rule among the Romans was, nee sequi bellum, nec fugere—neither to urge war, nor yet to shun it.

19. He that goeth about as a tale-bearer revealeth secrets: therefore meddle not with him that flattereth with his lips.

Two sorts of people are dangerous to be conversed with.

1. Tale-bearers; though they are commonly flatterers, and by speaking fair insinuate themselves into men's acquaintance. Those are unprincipled people, that go about carrying stories, that make mischief among neighbours and relations, that sow in the minds of people jealousies of their governors, of their ministers, and of one another, that reveal secrets which they are intrusted with, or which, by unfair means, they come to the knowledge of; or, under pretence of guessing at men's thoughts and intentions, tell that of them which is really false. "Be not familiar with such, do not give them the hearing when they tell their tales and reveal secrets, for you may be sure that they will betray your secrets too, and tell tales of you."

2. Flatterers, for they are commonly tale-bearers. If a man fawn upon you, compliment and commend you, suspect him to have some design upon you, and stand upon your guard; he would pick that out of you, which will serve him to make a story of to somebody else, to your prejudice; therefore meddle not with him that flatters with his lips. Those too dearly love, and too dearly buy, their own praise, that will put confidence in a man, and trust him with a secret or business, because he speaks fairly to them.

20. Whoso curseth his father or his mother, his lamp shall be put out in obscure darkness.

Here is, 1. An undutiful child become very wicked by degrees; he began with despising his father and mother, slighting their instructions, disobeying their commands, and raging at their rebukes, but at length he arrives at such a pitch of impudence and impiety as to curse them, to give them scurrilous and opprobrious language, and to wish mischief to them who were the instruments of his being, and have taken so much care and pains about him; and this, in defiance of God and his law, which has made this a capital crime, (Exod. 21. 17. Matth. 15. 4.) and in violation of all the bonds of duty, natural affection, and gratitude.

2. An undutiful child become very miserable at last; His lamp shall be put out in obscure darkness; all his honour shall be laid in the dust, and he shall for ever lose his reputation; let him never expect any peace or comfort in his own mind, no, nor to prosper in this world. His days shall be shortened, and the lamp of his life extinguished, according to the reverse of the promise in the fifth commandment. His family shall be cut off, and his posterity be a curse to him; and it will be his eternal ruin, the lamp of his happiness shall be put out in the blackness of darkness, so the word is, even that which is for ever, Jude, 13. Matth. 22. 13.

21. An inheritance may be gotten hastily at the beginning; but the end thereof shall not be blessed.

Note, 1. It is possible that an estate may be suddenly raised. There are those who will be rich, by right or wrong, who make no conscience of what they say or do, if they can but get money by it, who, when it is in their power, will cheat their own father, and who sordidly spare and hoard up what they get, grudging themselves and their families food convenient, and thinking all lost but what they buy land with, or put out to interest. By such ways as these a man may grow rich, may grow very rich, in a little time, at his first setting out.

2. An estate that is suddenly raised is often as suddenly ruined; it was raised hastily, but, not being raised honestly, it proves soon ripe and soon rotten, the end thereof shall not be blessed of God, and, if he do not bless it, it can neither be comfortable, nor of any continuance; so that he who got it, at the end, will be a fool. He had better have taken time, and built firmly.

22. Say not thou, I will recompense evil; but wait on the LORD, and he shall save thee.

They that live in this world must expect to have injuries done them, affronts given them, and trouble wrongfully created them, for we dwell among briars. Now here we are told what to do when we have wrong done us;

1. We must not avenge ourselves, no, nor so much as think of it, or design it; "Say not thou, no not in thy heart, I will recompense evil for evil; do not please thyself with the thought that some time or other thou shalt have an opportunity of being quits with him. Do not wish revenge, or hope for it, much less resolve upon it, no, not when the injury is fresh, and the resentments of it most deep. Never say that thou wilt do a thing which thou canst not in faith pray to God to assist thee in; and that thou canst not do in meditating revenge."

2. We must refer ourselves to God, and leave it to him to plead our cause, to maintain our right, and reckon with those that do us wrong, in such a way and manner as he thinks fit, and in his own due time; "Wait on the Lord, attend his pleasure, acquiesce in his will, and he does not say that he shall punish him that has injured thee; instead of desiring that, thou must forgive him and pray for him, but he shall save thee, and that is enough. He will protect thee, so that thy passing by one injury shall not (as is commonly feared) expose thee to another; nay, he will recompense good to thee, to balance thy trouble, and encourage thy patience," as David hoped, when Shimei cursed him, 2 Sam. 16. 12.

23. Divers weights are an abomination unto the LORD; and a false balance is not good.

This is to the same purport with what was said v. 10.

1. It is here repeated, because it is a sin that God doubly hates; as lying (which is of the same nature with this sin) is mentioned twice among the seven things that God hates, ch. 6. 17, 19.

and because, probably, it was a sin very much practised at that time in Israel, and therefore made light of, as if there were no harm in it, under pretence that, being commonly used, there was no trading without it.

2. It is here added, A false balance is not good; to intimate that it is not only abominable to God, but unprofitable to the sinner himself; there is really no good to be got by it, no, not a good bargain, for a bargain made by fraud will prove a losing bargain in the end.

24. Man's goings are of the LORD; how can a man then understand his own way?

We are here taught, that, in all our affairs,

1. We have a necessary and constant dependence upon God; all our natural actions depend upon his providence, all our spiritual actions upon his grace. The best man is no better than God makes him; and every creature is that to us which it is the will of God that it should be. Our enterprises succeed, not as we desire and design, but as God directs and disposes. The goings even of a strong man, so the word signifies, are of the Lord, for his strength is weakness without God, nor is the battle always to the strong.

2. We have no foresight of future events, and therefore know not how to forecast for them; How can a man understand his own way? How can he tell what will befall him, since God's counsels concerning him are secret? and therefore how can he of himself contrive what to do, without divine direction? We so little understand our own way, that we know not what is good for ourselves, and therefore we must make a virtue of necessity, and commit our way unto the Lord, in whose hand it is, follow the guidance, and submit to the disposal, of Providence.

25. It is a snare to the man who devoureth that which is holy, and after vows to make inquiry.

Two things, by which God is greatly affronted, men are here said to be ensnared by, and entangled not only in guilt, but in trouble and ruin at length.

1. Sacrilege; men's alienating holy things, and converting them to their own use, which is here called devouring them. What is devoted any way to the service and honour of God, for the support of religion and divine worship, or the relief of the poor, ought to be conscientiously preserved to the purposes designed; and those that directly or indirectly embezzle them, or defeat the purpose for which they were given, will have a great deal to answer for; Will a man rob God in tithes and offerings? Mal. 3. 8. Those that hurry over religious offices, (their praying and preaching,) and huddle them up in haste, as being impatient to get done, may be said to devour that which is holy.

2. Covenant-breaking. It is a snare to a man, after he has made vows to God, to inquire how he may evade them, or get them dispensed with, and to contrive excuses for the violating of them. If the matter of them was doubtful, and the expressions ambiguous, that was his fault, he should have made them with more caution and consideration, for it will involve his conscience (if it be tender) in great perplexities, if he be to inquire concerning them afterward; (Ecc. 5. 6.) for when we have opened our mouth to the Lord, it is too late to think of going back, Acts, 5. 4.

26. A wise king scattereth the wicked, and bringeth the wheel over them.

See here, 1. What is the business of magistrates; they are to be a terror to evil-doers. They must scatter the wicked, who are linked in confederacies to assist and imbolden one another in doing mischief; and there is no doing this but by bringing the wheel over them, putting the laws in execution against them, crushing their power, and quashing their projects. Severity must sometimes be used, to rid the country of those that are openly vicious and mischievous, debauched and debauching.

2. What is the qualification of magistrates, which is necessary in order to this; they have need to be both pious and prudent, for it is the wise king, that is both religious and discreet, that is likely to effect the suppression of vice and reformation of manners.

27. The spirit of man is the candle of the LORD, searching all the inward parts of the belly.

We have here the dignity of the soul, the great soul of man, that light which lighteth every man.

1. It is a divine light; it is the candle of the Lord, a candle of his lighting, for it is the inspiration of the Almighty, that gives us understanding. He forms the spirit of man within him. It is after the image of God that man is created in knowledge. Conscience, that noble faculty, is God's deputy in the soul; it is a candle not only lighted by him, but lighted for him. The Father of spirits is therefore called the Father of lights.

2. It is a discovering light. By the help of reason we come to know men, to judge of their characters, and dive into their designs; by the help of conscience we come to know ourselves. The spirit of a man has a self-consciousness; (1 Cor. 2.11.) it searches into the dispositions and affections of the soul, praises what is good, condemns what is otherwise, and judges of the thoughts and intents of the heart. This is the office, this the power, of conscience, which we are therefore concerned to get rightly informed, and keep void of offence.

28. Mercy and truth preserve the king: and his throne is upholden by mercy.

Here is, 1. The virtues of a good king; those are mercy and truth, especially mercy, for that is mentioned twice here. He must be strictly faithful to his word, must be sincere, and abhor all dissimulation, must religiously discharge all the trusts reposed in him, must support and countenance truth. He must likewise rule with clemency, and by all acts of compassion gain the affections of his people. Mercy and truth are the glories of God's throne, and kings are called gods.

2. The advantages he gains thereby. These virtues will preserve his person, and support his government, will make him easy and safe, beloved by his own people, and feared by his enemies, if it be possible that he should have any.

29. The glory of young men is their strength: and the beauty of old men is the gray head.

This shews that both young and old have their advantages, and therefore must each of them be, according to their capacities, serviceable to the public, and neither of them despise or envy the other.

1. Let not old people despise the young, for they are strong and fit for action, able to go through business, and break through difficulties, which the aged and weak cannot grapple with. The glory of young men is their strength, provided they use it well, (in the service of God and their country, not of their lusts,) and that they be not proud of it, nor trust to it.

2. Let not young people despise the old, for they are grave, and fit for counsel, and though they have not the strength that young men have, yet they have more wisdom and experience. Juniors ad labores, seniores ad honores—Labour is for the young, honour for the aged. God has put honour upon the old man; for his gray head is his beauty. See Dan. 7. 9.

30. The blueness of a wound cleanseth away evil: so do stripes the inward parts of the belly.

Note, 1. Many need severe rebukes. Some children are so obstinate, that their parents can do no good with them without sharp correction; some criminals must feel the rigour of the law and public justice; gentle methods will not work upon them; they must be beaten black and blue. And the wise God sees that his own children sometimes need very sharp afflictions.

2. Severe rebukes sometimes do a great deal of good, as corrosives contribute to the cure of a wound, eating out the proud flesh. The rod drives out even that foolishness which was bound up in the heart, and cleanses away the evil there.

3. Frequently those that most need severe rebukes can worst bear them. Such is the corruption of nature, that men are as loath to be rebuked sharply for their sins as to be beaten till their bones ache. Correction is grievous to him that forsakes the way, and yet it is good for him, Heb. 12. 11.

CHAP. XXI.

1. The king's heart is in the hand of the LORD, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will.

Note, 1. Even the hearts of men are in God's hand, and not only their goings, as he had said, ch. 20. 24. God can change men's minds, can, by a powerful insensible operation upon their spirits, turn them from that which they seemed most intent upon, and incline them to that which they seemed most averse to, as the husbandman, by canals and gutters, turns the water through his grounds as he pleases, which does not alter the nature of the water, or put any force upon it, any more than God's providence does upon the native freedom of man's will, but directs the course of it to serve his own purpose.

2. Even kings' hearts are so, notwithstanding their powers and prerogatives, as much as the hearts of common persons. The hearts of kings are unsearchable to us, much more unmanageable by us; as they have their Arcana imperii—State secrets, so they have the prerogatives of their crown, but the great God has them not only under his eye, but in his hand. Kings are what he makes them. Those that are most absolute are under God's government; he puts things into their hearts, Rev. 17. 17. Ezra, 7. 27.

2. Every way of a man is right in his own eyes: but the LORD pondereth the hearts.

Note, 1. We are all apt to be partial in judging of ourselves and our own actions, and to think too favourably of our own character, as if there were nothing amiss in it; Every way of a man, even his by-way, is right in his own eyes; the proud heart is very ingenious in putting a fair face upon a foul matter, and in making that appear right to itself, which is far from being so, to stop the mouth of conscience.

2. We are sure that the judgment of God concerning us is according to truth. Whatever our judgment is concerning ourselves, the Lord ponders the heart. God looks at the heart, and judges of men according to that, of their actions according to their principles and intentions; and his judgment of that is as exact as our's is of that which we ponder most, and more so; he weighs it in an unerring balance, ch. 16. 2.

3. To do justice and judgment is more acceptable to the LORD than sacrifice.

Here, 1. It is implied that many deceive themselves with a conceit, that, if they offer sacrifice, that will excuse them from doing justice, and procure them a dispensation for their unrighteousness; and this makes their way seem right, v. 2. We have fasted, Isa. 58. 3. I have peace-offerings with me, Prov. 7. 14.

2. It is plainly declared, that living a good life, doing justly, and loving mercy, are more pleasing to God than the most pompous and expensive instances of devotion; sacrifices were of divine institution, and were then acceptable to God, if they were offered in faith, and with repentance, otherwise not, Isa. 1. 11, &c. But moral duties were preferred before them, (1 Sam. 15. 22.) which intimates that their excellency was not innate, nor the obligation to them perpetual, Micah, 6. 6. 8. Much of religion lies in doing judgment and justice, from a principle of duty to God, contempt of the world, and love to our neighbour; and this is more pleasing to God than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices, Mark, 12. 33.

4. An high look, and a proud heart, and the ploughing of the wicked, is sin.

This may be taken as shewing us,

1. The marks of a wicked man. He that has a high look and a proud heart, that carries himself insolently and scornfully toward both God and man, and that is always ploughing and plotting, designing and devising some mischief or other, he is indeed a wicked man. The light of the wicked is sin. Sin is the pride, the ambition, the glory and joy, and the business, of wicked men.

2. The miseries of a wicked man. His raised expectations, and high designs, and most elaborate contrivances and projects, are sin to him; he contracts guilt in them, and so prepares trouble for himself. The very business of all wicked men, as well as their pleasure, is nothing but sin. So Bishop Patrick. They do all to serve their lusts, and have no regard to the glory of God in it, and therefore their ploughing is sin, and, no marvel, when their sacrificing is so, ch. 15. 3.

5. The thoughts of the diligent tend only to plenteousness; but of every one that is hasty only to want.

Here is, 1. The way to be rich. If we would live plentifully and comfortably in the world, we must be diligent in our business, and not shrink from the toil and trouble of it, but prosecute it closely, improving all advantages and opportunities for it, and doing what we do with all our might; yet we must not be hasty in it, nor hurry ourselves and others with it, but keep doing fair and softly, which, we say, goes far in a day. With diligence there must be contrivance; the thoughts of the diligent are as necessary as the hand of the diligent. Forecast is as good as work. Seest thou a man thus prudent and diligent? He will have enough to live on.

2. The way to be poor. Those that are hasty, that are rash and inconsiderate in their affairs, and will not take time to think, that are greedy of gain, by right or wrong, and make haste to be rich by unjust practices, or unwise projects, they are in the ready road to poverty. Their thoughts and contrivances, by which they hope to raise themselves, will ruin them.

6. The getting of treasures by a lying tongue is a vanity tossed to and fro of them that seek death.

This shews the folly of those that hope to enrich themselves by dishonest practices, by oppressing and over-reaching those with whom they deal, by false witness-bearing, or by fraudulent contracts; of those that make no conscience of their assertions when there is any thing to be got by a falsehood. They may perhaps heap up treasures by these means, that which they make their treasure; but,

1. They will not meet with the satisfaction they expect; it is a vanity tossed to and fro; it will be disappointment and vexation of spirit to them; they will not have the comfort of it, nor can they put any confidence in it, but will be perpetually uneasy. It will be tossed to and fro by their own consciences, and by the censures of men; let them expect to be in a constant hurry.

2. They will meet with the destruction they do not expect. While they are seeking wealth by such unlawful practices, they are really seeking death, they lay themselves open to the envy and ill will of men by the treasures they get, and to the wrath and curse of God by the lying tongue wherewith they get them, which he will make to fall upon themselves, and sink them to hell.

7. The robbery of the wicked shall destroy them; because they refuse to do judgment.

See here, 1. The nature of injustice. Getting money by lying (v. 6.) is no better than downright robbery. Cheating is stealing; you had as good pick a man's pocket, as impose upon him by a lie, in making a bargain which he had no fence against but by not believing you; and it will be no excuse from the guilt of robbery to say that he might choose whether he would believe you, for that is a debt we should owe to all men.

2. The cause of injustice. Men refuse to do judgment, they will not render to all their due, but withhold it, and omissions make way for commissions; they come at length to robbery itself. They that refuse to do justice will choose to do wrong.

3. The effect of injustice; it will return upon the sinner's own head. The robbery of the wicked will terrify them, so some; their consciences will be filled with horror and amazement, will cut them, will saw them asunder, so others; it will destroy them, here and for ever, therefore he had said, (v. 6.) They seek death.

8. The way of man is froward and strange: but as for the pure, his work is right.

This shews, that as men are, so is their way.

1. Evil men have evil ways. If the man be froward, his way also is strange; and this is the way of most men, such is the general corruption of mankind. They are all gone aside; (Ps. 14. 2, 3.) all flesh have perverted their way. But the froward man, the man of deceit, that acts by craft and trick in all he does, his way is strange, contrary to all the rules of honour and honesty; it is strange, for you know not where to find him, or when you have him; it is strange, for it is alienated from all good, and estranges men from God and his favour. It is what he beholds afar off, and so do all honest men.

2. Men that are pure are proved to be such by their work, for it is right, it is just and regular; and they are accepted of God, and approved of men. The way of mankind in their apostacy is froward and strange, but as for the pure, those that by the grace of God are recovered out of that state, of which there is here and there one, their work is right, as Noah's was in the old world, Gen. 7. 1.

9. It is better to dwell in a corner of the house-top, than with a brawling woman in a wide house.

See here, 1. What a great affliction it is to a man to have a brawling, scolding, woman to his wife; who, upon every occasion, and often upon no occasion, breaks out into passion, and chides either him or those about her, is fretful to herself, and furious to her children and servants, and, in both, vexatious to her husband. If a man has a wide house, spacious and pompous, this will imber the comfort of it to him; a house of society, so the word is, in which a man may be sociable, and entertain his friends, this will make both him and his house unsociable, and unfit for the enjoyments of true friendship. It makes a man ashamed of his choice and his management, and disturbs company.

2. What many a man is forced to do under such an affliction. He cannot keep up his authority; he finds it to no purpose to contradict the most unreasonable passion, for it is unruly, and rages so much the more; and his wisdom and grace will not suffer him to render railing for railing, nor his conjugal affection to use any severity, and therefore he finds it his best way to retire into a corner of the house-top, and sit alone there, out of the hearing of her clamour; and, if he employ himself well there, as he may do, it is the wisest course he can take. Better do so, than quit the house, and go into bad company; for diversion, as many, who, like Adam, make their wife's sin the excuse of their own.

10. The soul of the wicked desireth evil: his neighbour findeth no favour in his eyes.

See here the character of a very wicked man.

1. The strong inclination he has to do mischief; His very soul desires evil, desires that evil may be done, and that he may have the pleasure, not only of seeing it, but of having a hand in it; the root of wickedness lies in the soul; the desire that men have to do evil, that is the lust which conceives and brings forth sin.

2. The strong aversion he has to do good; His neighbour, his friend, his nearest relation, finds no favour in his eyes, cannot gain from him the least kindness, though he be in the greatest need of it. And, when he is in the pursuit of the evil his heart is so much upon, he will spare no man that stands in his way; his next neighbour shall be used no better than a stranger, than an enemy.

11. When the scorner is punished, the simple is made wise: and when the wise is instructed, he receiveth knowledge.

This we had before, (ch. 19. 25.) and it shews, that there are two ways by which the simple may be made wise.

1. By the punishments that are inflicted on those that are incorrigibly wicked. Let the law be executed upon a scorner, and even he that is simple will be awakened and alarmed by it, and will discern, more than he did, the evil of sin, and will take warning by it, and take heed.

2. By the instructions that are given to those that are wise and willing to be taught; When the wise is instructed by the preaching of the word, he, not only the wise himself, but the simple, that stands by, receives knowledge. It is no injustice at all to take a good lesson to ourselves which was designed for another.

12. The righteous man wisely considereth the house of the wicked: but God overthroweth the wicked for their wickedness.

1. As we read this verse, it shews the reason why good men, when they come to understand things right, will not envy the prosperity of evil-doers. When they see the house of the wicked, how full it is, perhaps, of all the good things of this life, they are tempted to envy; but when they wisely consider it, when they look upon it with an eye of faith, when they see God overthrowing the wicked for their wickedness, that there is a curse upon their habitation, which will certainly be the ruin of it ere long, they see more reason to despise them, or pity them, than to fear or envy them.

2. Some give another sense of it; The righteous man, the judge or magistrate, that is intrusted with the execution of justice, and the preservation of the public peace, examines the house of the wicked, searches it for arms, or for stolen goods, makes a diligent inquiry concerning his family, and the characters of those about him, that he may by his power overthrow the wicked for their wickedness, and prevent their doing any further mischief, that he may fire the nests where the birds of prey are harboured, or the unclean birds.

13. Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard.

Here is the description and doom of an uncharitable man.

1. His description; He stops his ears at the cry of the poor, at the cry of their wants and miseries, he resolves to take no cognizance of them; at the cry of their requests and supplications, he resolves he will not so much as give them the hearing, turns them away from his door, and forbids them to come near him; or if he cannot avoid hearing them, he will not heed them, nor be moved by their complaints, nor be prevailed with by their importunities; he shuts up the bowels of his compassion, and that is equivalent to the stopping of his ears, Acts. 7. 57.

2. His doom; He shall himself be reduced to straits, which will make him cry, and then he shall not be heard. Men will not hear him, but reward him as he has rewarded others. God will not hear him; for he that shewed no mercy shall have judgment without mercy; (Jam. 2. 13.) and he that on earth denied a crumb of bread, in hell was denied a drop of water. God will be deaf to their prayers who are deaf to the cries of the poor, which, if they be not heard by us, will be heard against us, Exod. 22. 23.

14. A gift in secret pacifieth anger: and a reward in the bosom strong wrath.

Here is, 1. The power that is commonly found to be in gifts. Nothing is more violent than anger; Oh the force of strong wrath! And yet a handsome present, prudently managed, will turn away some men's wrath, when it seemed implacable, and discharge the keenest and most passionate resentments. Covetousness is commonly a master-sin, and has the command of other lusts. Pecuniæ obediunt omnia—Money commands all things. Thus Jacob pacified Esau, and Abigail David.

2. The policy that is commonly used in giving and receiving bribes; it must be a gift in secret, and a reward in the bosom; for he that takes it would not be thought to covet it, nor known to receive it, nor would he willingly be beholden to him whom he has been offended with; but if it be done privately all is well. No man should be too open in giving any gift, nor boast of the presents he sends; but if it be a bribe to pervert justice, that is so scandalous, that those who are fond of it are ashamed of it.

15. It is joy to the just to do judgment: but destruction shall be to the workers of iniquity.

Note, 1. It is a pleasure and satisfaction to good men, both to see justice administered by the government they live under, right taking place, and iniquity suppressed, and also to practise it themselves, according as their sphere is. They not only do justice, but do it with pleasure; not only for fear of shame, but for love of virtue.

2. It is a terror to wicked men to see the laws put in execution against vice and profaneness; it is destruction to them; as it is also a vexation to them to be forced, either for the support of their credit, or for fear of punishment, to do judgment themselves. Or, if we take it as we read it, the meaning is; There is true pleasure in the practice of religion, but certain destruction at the end of all vicious courses.

16. The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead.

Here is, 1. The sinner upon his ramble; He wanders out of the way of understanding, and when once he has left that good way, he wanders endlessly. The way of religion is the way of understanding; those that are not truly pious are not truly intelligent; those that wander out of this way break the hedge which God has set, and follow the conduct of the world and the flesh; and they go astray like lost sheep.

2. The sinner at his rest, or rather his ruin; He shall remain (quiescet—he shall rest, but not in peace—in peace) in the congregation of the giants, the sinners of the old world that were swept away by the deluge; to that destruction the damnation of sinners is compared, as sometimes to the destruction of Sodom, when they are said to have their portion in fire and brimstone. Or in the congregation of the damned that are under the power of the second death. There is a vast congregation of damned sinners, bound in bundles for the fire, and in that they shall remain, remain for ever, who are shut out from the congregation of the righteous. He that forsakes the way to heaven, if he return not to it, will certainly sink into the depths of hell.

17. He that loveth pleasure shall be a poor man: he that loveth wine and oil shall not be rich.

Here is an argument against a voluptuous, luxurious, life, taken from the ruin it brings upon men's temporal interests. Here is,

1. The description of an epicure; He loves pleasure. God allows us to use the delights of sense soberly and temperately, wine to make glad the heart, and put vigour into the spirits, and oil to make the face to shine, and beautify the countenance; but he that loves these, that sets his heart upon them, covets them earnestly, is solicitous to have all the delights of sense wound up to the height of pleasurable, is impatient of every thing that crosses him in his pleasures, relishes these as the best pleasures, and has his mouth by them put out of taste for spiritual delights, he is an epicure, 2 Tim. 3. 4.

2. The punishment of an epicure in this world; He shall be a poor man; for the lusts of sensuality are not maintained but at a great expence; and there are instances of those who want necessities, and live upon alms, who once could not live without dainties and varieties. Many a beau becomes a beggar.

18. The wicked shall be a ransom for the righteous, and the transgressor for the upright.

This intimates,

1. What should be done by the justice of men; The wicked, that are the troublers of a land, ought to be punished, for the preventing and turning away of those national judgments which otherwise will be inflicted, and in which even the righteous are many times involved. Thus, when Achan was stoned, he was a ransom for the camp of righteous Israel; and the seven sons of Saul, when they were hanged, were a ransom for the kingdom of righteous David.

2. What is often done by the providence of God; The righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked comes in his stead, and so seems as if he were a ransom for him, ch. 11. 8. God will rather leave many wicked people to be cut off than abandon his own people. I will give men for thee, Isa. 43. 3, 4.

19. It is better to dwell in the wilderness, than with a contentious and an angry woman.

Note, 1. Unbridled passions imber and spoil the comfort of all relations. A peevish angry wife makes her husband's life uneasy, to whom she should be a comfort and a meet help. Those cannot dwell in peace and happiness that cannot dwell in peace and love. Even those that are one flesh, if they be not withal one spirit, have no joy of their union.

2. It is better to have no company than bad company. The wife of thy covenant is thy companion, and yet if she be peevish and provoking, it is better to dwell in a solitary wilderness, exposed to wind and weather, than in company with her. A man may better enjoy God and himself in a wilderness than among quarrelsome relations and neighbours. See v. 9.

20. There is a treasure to be desired and oil in the dwelling of the wise; but a foolish man spendeth it up.

Note, 1. Those that are wise will increase what they have, and live plentifully; their wisdom will teach them to proportion their expences to their income, and to lay up for hereafter; so that there is a treasure of things to be desired, and as much as needs be desired, a good stock of all things convenient, laid up in season, and particularly of oil, one of the staple commodities of Canaan, Dent. 8. 8. This is in the habitation, or cottage, of the wise; and it is better to have an old-fashioned house, and have it well-furnished, than a fine modern one, ill-kept. God blesses the endeavours of the wise, and then their houses are replenished.

2. Those that are foolish will mispend what they have, upon their lusts, and so bring the stock they had, to nothing. Those manage themselves ill, that are in haste to spend what they have, but not in care which way to get more. Foolish children spend what their wise parents had laid up; one sinner destroys much good, as the prodigal son.

21. He that followeth after righteousness and mercy, findeth life, righteousness, and honour.

See here, 1. What it is to make religion our business; it is to follow after righteousness and mercy; not to content ourselves with easy performances, but to do our duty with the utmost care and pains, as those that are pressing forward, and in fear of coming short; we must both do justly, and love mercy, and proceed and persevere therein; and though we cannot attain to perfection, yet it will be a comfort to us if we aim at it, and follow after it.

2. What will be the advantage of doing so; Those that do follow after righteousness, shall find righteousness; God will give them grace to do good, and they shall have the pleasure and comfort of it; they that make conscience of being just to others, shall be justly dealt with by others, and others shall be kind to them. The Jews followed after righteousness, and did not find it, because they sought amiss, Rom. 9. 31. Otherwise, Seek and you shall find, and with it shall find both life and honour, everlasting life and honour, the crown of righteousness.

22. A wise man scaleth the city of the mighty, and casteth down the strength of the confidence thereof.

Note, 1. Those that have power are apt to promise themselves great things from their power. The city of the mighty thinks itself impregnable, and therefore its strength is the confidence thereof, what it boasts of, and trusts in, bidding defiance to danger.

2. Those that have wisdom, though they are so modest as not to promise much, often perform great things, even against those that are so confident of their strength, by their wisdom. Good conduct will go far even against force; and a stratagem, well-managed, may effectually scale the city of the mighty, and cast down the strength it had such a confidence in. A wise man will gain upon the affections of people, and conquer them by strength of reason, which is a more noble conquest than that by strength of arms. They that understand their interest will willingly submit themselves to a wise and good man, and the strongest walls shall not hold out against him.

23. Whoso keepeth his mouth and his tongue keepeth his soul from troubles.

Note, 1. It is our great concern to keep our soul from straits, from being entangled in snares and perplexities, and disquieted with troubles, that we may preserve the possession and enjoyment of ourselves, and our souls may be in frame for the service of God.

2. Those that would keep their souls, must keep a watch before the door of their lips, must keep the mouth by temperance, that no forbidden fruit go into it, no stolen waters, that nothing be eaten or drunk to excess; they must keep the tongue also, that no forbidden word go out of the door of the lips, no corrupt communication. By a constant watchfulness over our words, we shall prevent abundance of mischiefs which an ungoverned tongue runs men into. Keep thy heart, and that will keep thy tongue from sin; keep thy tongue, and that will keep thy heart from trouble.

24. Proud and haughty scorner is his name, who dealeth in proud wrath.

See here the mischief of pride and haughtiness.

1. It exposes men to sin, it makes them passionate, and kindles in them the fire of proud wrath; they are continually dealing in it, as if it were their trade to be angry, and they had nothing so much to do as to barter passions, and exchange bitter words. Most of the wrath that inflames the spirits and societies of men, is proud wrath. Men cannot bear the least slight, nor in any thing to be crossed or contradicted, but they are out of humour, and in a heat, immediately. It likewise makes them scornful when they are angry, very abusive with their tongues, insolent toward those above them, and imperious toward all about them; only by pride comes all this.

2. It exposes men to shame; they get a bad name by it, and every one calls them proud and haughty scorners, and therefore no body cares for having any thing to do with them. If men would but consult their reputation a little, and the credit of their profession, which suffers with it, they would not indulge their pride and passion as they do.

25. The desire of the slothful killeth him; for his hands refuse to labour. 26. He coveteth greedily all the day long: but the righteous giveth and spareth not.

Here is, 1. The miseries of the slothful, whose hands refuse to labour in an honest calling, by which they might get an honest livelihood; they are as fit for labour as other men, and business offers itself, to which they might lay their hands, and apply their minds, but they will not; herein they fondly think they do well for themselves; (see ch. 26. 16.) Soul, take thine ease; but really they are enemies to themselves; for, beside that their slothfulness starves them, depriving them of their necessary supports, their desires at the same time stab them; though their hands refuse to labour, their hearts cease not to covet riches, and pleasures, and honours, which yet cannot be obtained without labour; their desires are impetuous and insatiable, they covet greedily all the day long, and cry, Give, give; they expect every body should do for them, though they will do nothing for themselves, much less for any body else; now these desires kill them, they are a perpetual vexation to them, fret them to death, and, perhaps, put them upon such dangerous courses, for the satisfying of their craving lusts, as hasten them to an untimely end. Many that must have money, with which to make provision for the flesh, and would not be at the pains to get it honestly, have turned highwaymen, and that has killed them. Those that are slothful in the affairs of their souls, and yet have desires toward that which would be the happiness of their souls, those desires kill them, will aggravate their condemnation, and be witnesses against them, that they were convinced of the worth of spiritual blessings, but refused to be at the pains that are necessary to the obtaining of them.

2. The honours of the honest and diligent. The righteous and industrious have their desires satisfied, and enjoy not only that satisfaction, but the further satisfaction of doing good to others. The slothful are always craving, and gaping to receive, but the righteous are always full, and contriving to give; and it is more blessed to give than to receive. They give, and spare not; give liberally, and upbraid not; they give a portion to seven, and also to eight, and do not spare for fear of wanting.

27. The sacrifice of the wicked is abomination: how much more, when he bringeth it with a wicked mind!

Sacrifices were of divine institution, and, when they were offered in faith, and with repentance and reformation, God was greatly honoured by them, and well-pleased in them; but they were often not only unacceptable, but an abomination, to God, and he declared so; which was an indication, both that they were not required for their own sakes, and that there were better things, and more effectual, in reserve, when sacrifice and offering should be done away. They were an abomination,

1. When they were brought by wicked men, who did not, according to the true intent and meaning of sacrificing, repent of their sins, mortify their lusts, and amend their lives. Cain brought his offering. Even wicked men may be found in the external performances of religious worship; they can freely give God their beasts, their lips, their knees, who would not give him their hearts; the Pharisees gave alms. But when the person is an abomination, as every wicked man is to God, the performance cannot but be so; even when he brings it diligently; so some read the latter part of the verse. Though their offerings are continually before God, (Ps. 50. 8.) they are an abomination to him.

2. Much more when they were brought with wicked minds, when their sacrifices were made, not only consistent with, but serviceable to, their wickedness; as Absalom's vow, Jezebel's fast, and the Pharisees' long prayers. When men make a shew of devotion, that they may the more easily and effectually compass some covetous or malicious design; when holiness is pretended, but some wickedness intended; then, especially, the performance is an abomination, Isa. 66. 5.

28. A false witness shall perish: but the man that heareth speaketh constantly.

Here is, 1. The doom of a false witness; He who, for favour to one side, or malice to the other, gives in a false evidence, or makes an affidavit of that which he knows to be false, or, at least, does not know to be true, if it be discovered, his reputation will be ruined; a man may tell a lie perhaps in his haste, but he that gives in a false testimony does it with deliberation and solemnity, and it cannot but be a presumptuous sin, and a forfeiture of man's credit; but, though it should not be discovered, he himself shall be ruined; the vengeance he imprecated upon himself, when he took the false oath, will come upon him.

2. The praise of him that is conscientious; He who hears, obeys the command of God, which is to speak every man truth with his neighbour; he who testifies nothing but what he has heard and knows to be true, speaks constantly, consistently with himself; he is always in the same story; he speaks in finem—to the end; people will give credit to him, and hear him out; he speaks unto victory, he carries the cause, which the false witness shall lose; he shall speak to eternity; what is true, is true eternally. The lip of truth is established for ever.

29. A wicked man hardeneth his face: but as for the upright, he directeth his way.

Here is, 1. The presumption and impudence of a wicked man; He hardens his face, brazens it, that he may not blush, steels it, that he may not tremble, when he commits the greatest crimes; he bids defiance to the terrors of the law, and the checks of his own conscience, the reproofs of the word and the rebukes of Providence; he will have his way, and nothing shall hinder him, Isa. 57. 17.

2. The caution and circumspection of a good man; as for the upright, he does not say, What would I do? What have I a mind to? That I will have; but, What should I do? What does God require of me? What is duty? What is prudence? What is for edification? And so he does not force his way, but direct his way by a safe and certain rule.

30. There is no wisdom nor understanding nor counsel against the LORD. 31. The horse is prepared against the day of battle: but safety is of the LORD.

The designing, busy, part of mankind are here directed, in all their counsels and undertakings, to have their eye to God, and to believe,

1. That there can be no success against God, and therefore they must never act in opposition to him, in contempt of his commands, or in contradiction to his counsels. Though they think they have wisdom, and understanding, and counsel, the best politics and politicians, on their side, yet, if it be against the Lord, it cannot prosper long, it shall not prevail at last. He that sits in heaven laughs at men's projects against him and his Anointed, and will carry his point in despite of them, Ps. 2. 1. 6. They that fight against God are preparing shame and ruin for themselves; whoever make war with the Lamb, he will certainly overcome them, Rev. 17. 14.

2. That there can be no success without God, and therefore they must never act but in dependence on him. Be the cause ever so good, and the patrons of it ever so strong, and wise, and faithful, and the means of carrying it on, and gaining the point, ever so probable, still they must acknowledge God, and take him along with them. Means, indeed, are to be used; the horse must be prepared against the day of battle, and the foot too, they must be armed and disciplined; in Solomon's time, even Israel's kings used horses in war, though they were forbidden to multiply them; but, after all, safety and salvation is of the Lord; he can save without armies, but armies cannot without him; and therefore he must be sought to, and trusted in, for success, and, when success is obtained, he must have all the glory. When we are preparing for the day of battle, our great concern must be to make God our Friend, and secure his favour.

CHAP. XXII.

1. A GOOD name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favour rather than silver and gold.

Here are two things which are more valuable, and which we should covet more, than great riches.

1. To be well-spoken of; A name, that is, a good man, a name for good things with God and good people, this is rather to be chosen than great riches; that is, we should be more careful to do that by which we may get and keep a good name, than that by which we may raise and increase a great estate. Great riches bring great cares with them, expose men to danger, and add no real value to a man. A fool and a knave may have great riches, but a good name makes a man easy and safe, supposes a man wise and honest, redounds to the glory of God, and gives a man a greater opportunity of doing good. By great riches we may relieve the bodily wants of others, but by a good name we may recommend religion to them.

2. To be well-beloved; to have an interest in the esteem and affections of all about us; this is better than silver and gold. Christ had neither silver nor gold, but he grew in favour with God and man, Luke, 2. 52. This should teach us to look with a holy contempt upon the wealth of this world, not to set our hearts upon that, but with all possible care to think on those things that are lovely, and of good report, Phil. 4. 8.

2. The rich and poor meet together: the LORD is the maker of them all.

Note, 1. Among the children of men, Divine Providence has so ordered it, that some are rich and others poor, and these are intermixed in societies; the Lord is the Maker of both; both the Author of their beings, and the Disposer of their lot. The greatest man in the world must acknowledge God to be his Maker, and is under the same obligations to be subject to him that the meanest are; and the poorest have the honour to be the work of God's hands as much as the greatest. Have they not all one Father? Mal. 2. 10. Job, 31. 15. God makes some rich, that they may be charitable to the poor, and others poor, that they may be serviceable to the rich; and they have need one of another, 1 Cor. 12. 21. He makes some poor, to exercise their patience, and contentment, and dependence upon God; and others rich, to exercise their thankfulness and beneficence. Even the poor we have always with us, they shall never cease out of the land, nor the rich neither.

2. Notwithstanding the distance that is in many respects between rich and poor, yet in most things they meet together, especially before the Lord, who is the Maker of them all, and regards not the rich more than the poor, Job, 34. 19. Rich and poor meet together at the bar of God's justice; all guilty before God, concluded under sin, and shapen in iniquity, the rich as much as the poor; and they meet at the throne of God's grace; the poor are as welcome there as the rich. There is the same Christ, the same scripture, the same Spirit, the same covenant of promises, for them both. There is the same heaven for poor saints that there is for rich; Lazarus is in the bosom of Abraham: and there is the same hell for rich sinners that there is for poor. All stand upon the same level before God, as they do also in the grave. The small and great are there.

3. A prudent man foreseeth the evil, and hideth himself: but the simple pass on, and are punished.

See here, 1. The benefit of wisdom and consideration; A prudent man, by the help of his prudence, will foresee an evil before it comes, and hide himself; he will be aware when he is entering into a temptation, and will put on his armour, and stand on his guard; when the clouds are gathering for a storm, he takes the warning, and flies to the name of the Lord as his strong tower. Noah foresaw the deluge, Joseph the years of famine, and provided accordingly.

2. The mischief of rashness and inconsideration; the simple, who believe every word that flatters them, will believe none that warns them, and so they pass on, and are punished; they venture upon sin, though they are told what will be in the end thereof; they throw themselves into trouble, notwithstanding the fair warning given them, and they repent their presumption when it is too late. See an instance of both these, Exod. 9. 20, 21. Nothing is so fatal to precious souls as this, they will not take warning.

4. By humility and the fear of the LORD are riches, honour, and life.

See here, 1. Wherein religion does very much consist; in humility, and the fear of the Lord; that is, walking humbly with God; we must so reverence God's majesty and authority, as to submit with all humility to the commands of his word, and the disposals of his providence. We must have such low thoughts of ourselves, as to behave humbly toward God and man. Where the fear of God is, there will be humility.

2. What is to be gotten by it; riches, and honour, and comfort, and long life, in this world, as far as God sees good; at least, spiritual riches and honour in the favour of God, and the promises and privileges of the covenant of grace, and eternal life at last.

5. Thorns and snares are in the way of the froward: he that doth keep his soul shall be far from them.

Note, 1. The way of sin is vexatious and dangerous; In the way of the froward, that crooked way, which is contrary to the will and word of God, thorns and snares are found; thorns of grief for past sins, and snares entangling them in further sin. He that makes no conscience of what he says, and does, will find himself hampered by that imaginary liberty, and tormented by his pleasures. Froward people, who are soon angry, expose themselves to trouble at every step. Every thing will fret and vex him that will fret and vex at every thing.

2. The way of duty is safe and easy; He that keeps his soul, that watches carefully over his own heart and ways, is far from those thorns and snares, for his way is both plain and pleasant.

6. Train up a child in the way he should go: and when he is old, he will not depart from it.

Here is, 1. A great duty enjoined, particularly to those that are the parents and instructors of children, in order to the propagating of wisdom, that it may not die with them; Train up children in that age of vanity, to keep them from the sins and snares of it; in that learning age, to prepare them for what they are designed for. Catechise them, initiate them, keep them under discipline; train them as soldiers, who are taught to handle their arms, keep rank, and observe the word of command. Train them up, not in the way they would go, (the bias of their corrupt hearts would draw them aside,) but in the way they should go, the way in which, if you love them, you would have them go. Train up a child according as he is capable, so some take it; with a gentle hand, as nurses feed children, little and often, Deut. 6. 7.

2. A good reason for it, taken from the great advantage of this care and pains with children; when they grow up, when they grow old, it is to be hoped, they will not depart from it. Good impressions made upon them then, will abide upon them all their days. Ordinarily, the vessel retains the savour with which it was first seasoned. Many, indeed, have departed from the good way in which they were trained up; Solomon himself did; but it may be a means of their recovering themselves, as it is supposed Solomon did. At least, the parents will have the comfort of having done their duty, and used the means.

7. The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender.

He had said, (v. 2.) Rich and poor meet together; but here he finds, here he shews, that, as to the things of this life, there is a great difference; for,

1. Those that have little will be in subjection to those that have much, because they have dependence upon them, they have received, and expect to receive, support from them; The rich rule over the poor, and too often more than becomes them, with pride and rigour, unlike to God, who, though he be great, yet despises not any. It is part of the affliction of the poor, that they must expect to be trampled upon; and part of their duty, to be serviceable, as far as they can, to those that are kind to them, and study to be grateful.

2. Those that are going behind-hand, find themselves to lie much at the mercy of those that are before-hand; The borrower is servant to the lender, is obliged to him, and must sometimes beg,

Have patience with me. Therefore it is part of Israel's promised happiness, that they should lend and not borrow, Deut. 28. 12. And it should be our endeavour to keep as much as may be out of debt. Some sell their liberty to gratify their luxury.

8. He that soweth iniquity shall reap vanity: and the rod of his anger shall fail.

Note, 1. Ill-gotten gains will not prosper; He that sows iniquity, that does an unjust thing, in hopes to get by it, shall reap vanity; what he gets will never do him any good, nor give him any satisfaction. He will meet with nothing but disappointment. They that create trouble to others, do but prepare trouble for themselves. Men shall reap as they sow.

2. Abused power will not last. If the rod of authority turn into a rod of anger, if men rule by passion instead of prudence, and, instead of the public welfare, aim at nothing so much as the gratifying of their own resentments, it shall fail, and be broken, and their power shall not bear them out in their exorbitances, Isa. 10. 24, 25.

9. He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed; for he giveth of his bread to the poor.

Here is, 1. The description of a charitable man; he has a bountiful eye, opposed to the evil eye, (ch. 23. 6.) and the same with the single eye, (Matth. 6. 22.) an eye that seeks out objects of charity, beside those that offer themselves; an eye, that, upon the sight of one in want and misery, affects the heart with compassion; an eye, that, with the alms, gives a pleasant look, which makes the alms doubly acceptable. He has also a liberal hand, he gives of his bread to those that need; his bread, the bread appointed for his own eating. He will rather abridge himself than see the poor perish for want; yet he does not give all his bread, but of his bread; the poor shall have their share with his own family.

2. The blessedness of such a man; the joins of the poor will bless him, all about him will speak well of him, and God himself shall bless him, in answer to many a good prayer put up for him, and he shall be blessed.

10. Cast out the scorner, and contention shall go out; yea, strife and reproach shall cease.

See here, 1. What the scorner does; it is implied that he sows discord, and makes mischief, wherever he comes; much of the strife and contention which disturb the peace of all societies is owing to the evil interpreter, as some read it, that construes every thing into the worst; to those that despise and deride every one that comes in their way, and take a pride in bantering and abusing all mankind.

2. What is to be done with the scorner, that will not be reclaimed; Cast him out of your society, as Ishmael, when he mocked Isaac, was thrust out of Abraham's family. They that would secure the peace must seclude the scorner.

11. He that loveth pureness of heart, for the grace of his lips the king shall be his friend.

Here is, 1. The qualifications of an accomplished, a complete, gentleman, that is fit to be employed in public business; he must be an honest man, a man that loves pureness of heart, and hates all impurity; not only pure from all fleshly lusts, but from all deceit and dissimulation, from all selfishness and sinister designs; that takes care to approve himself a man of sincerity, is just and fair from principle, and delights in nothing more than in keeping his own conscience clear, and void of offence. He must also be able to speak with a good grace; not to daub and flatter, but to deliver himself decently and ingenuously, in language as clean and smooth as his spirit.

2. The preferment such a man stands fair for; The king, if he be wise and good, and understand his own and his people's interest, shall be his friend, shall make him of his cabinet-council, as there was one in David's court, and another in Solomon's, that was called the king's friend; or, in any business that he has, the king will befriend him. Some understand it of the King of kings; a man in whose spirit there is no guile, and whose speech is always with grace, God will be his Friend, Messiah, the Prince, will be his Friend; this honour have all the saints.

12. The eyes of the LORD preserve knowledge, and he overthroweth the words of the transgressor.

Here is, 1. The special care God takes to preserve knowledge, to keep up religion in the world, by keeping up among men the knowledge of himself and of good and evil, notwithstanding the corruption of mankind, and the artifices of Satan to blind men's minds and keep them in ignorance; it is a wonderful instance of the power and goodness of the eyes of the Lord, his watchful providence. He preserves men of knowledge, wise and good men, (2 Chron. 16. 9.) particularly faithful witnesses, who speak what they know; God protects such, and prospers their counsels. He does, by his grace, preserve knowledge in such, secures his own work and interest in them: see Prov. 2. 7, 8.

2. The just vengeance God takes on those that speak and act against knowledge, against their own knowledge, and against the interests of knowledge and religion in the world; He overthroweth the words of the transgressor, and preserves knowledge in spite of them. He defeats all the counsels and designs of false and treacherous men, and turns them to their own confusion.

13. The slothful man saith, There is a lion with out, I shall be slain in the streets.

Note, 1. Those that have no love for their business will never want excuses to shift it off. Multitudes are ruined, both for soul and body, by their slothfulness, and yet still they have something or other to say for themselves; so ingenious are men in putting a cheat upon their own souls! And who, I pray, will be the gainer at last, when the pretences will be all rejected as vain and frivolous?

2. Many frighten themselves from real duties by imaginary difficulties; The slothful man has work to do without in the fields, but he fancies there is a lion there; nay, he pretends he dares not go along the streets, for fear some body or other should meet him and kill him. He does not himself think so, he only says so to those that call him up; he talks of a lion without, but considers not his real danger from the Devil, that roaring lion, which is in bed with him, and from his own slothfulness, which kills him.

14. The mouth of strange women is a deep pit: he that is abhorred of the LORD shall fall therein.

This is designed to warn all young men against the lusts of uncleanness; as they tender the welfare of their souls, let them take heed of strange women, lewd women, whom they ought to be strange to; of the mouth of strange women, of the kisses of their lips, (ch. 7. 13.) of the words of their lips, their charms and enticements; dread them, have nothing to do with them; for,

1. Those who abandon themselves to that sin prove that they are abandoned of God; it is a deep pit, which those fall into that are abhorred of the Lord, who leaves them to themselves to enter into that temptation, and takes off the bridle of his restraining grace, to punish them for other sins. Value not thyself upon thy being in favour with such women, when it bespeaks thee under the wrath of God.

2. It is seldom that they recover themselves, for it is a deep pit, it will be hard getting out of it, it so besots the mind, and debauches the conscience, by pleasing the flesh.

15. Foolishness is bound in the heart of a child; but the rod of correction shall drive it far from him.

We have here two very sad considerations:

1. That corruption is woven into our nature; Sin is foolishness, it is contrary both to our right reason and to our true interest; it is in the heart, there is an inward inclination to sin, to speak and act foolishly; it is in the heart of children, they bring it into the world with them, it is what they were shapen and conceived in; it is not only found there, but it is bound there, it is annexed to the heart; so some vicious dispositions cleave close to the soul, are bound to it, as the scion to the stock into which it is grafted, which quite alters the property; there is a knot tied between the soul and sin, a true lover's knot; they two become one flesh. It is true of ourselves, it is true of our children, whom we have begot in our own likeness. O God, thou knowest this foolishness.

2. That correction is necessary to the cure of it; it will not be got out by fair means and gentle methods, there must be strictness and severity, and that which will cause grief. Children need to be corrected, and kept under discipline, by their parents; and we all need to be corrected by our heavenly Father; (Heb. 12. 6, 7.) and under the correction we must stroke down folly, and kiss the rod.

16. He that oppresseth the poor to increase his riches, and he that giveth to the rich, shall surely come to want.

This shews what evil courses rich men sometimes take, by which, in the end, they will impoverish themselves, and provoke God, notwithstanding their abundance, to bring them to want; they oppress the poor, and give to the rich; that is,

1. They will not in charity relieve the poor, but withhold from them, that, by saving that which is really the best, but which they think the most needless part, of their expences, they may increase their riches; but they will make presents to the rich, and give them great entertainments, either in pride and vain glory, that they may look great, or in policy, that they may receive it again with advantage; such shall surely come to want. Many have been beggared by a foolish generosity, but never any by a prudent charity. Christ bids us invite the poor, Luke, 14. 12, 13.

2. They not only will not relieve the poor, but they oppress them, rob the spital,* extort from their poor tenants and neighbours, invade their rights, who have not wherewithal to defend themselves, and then give bribes to the rich, to protect and countenance them in it; but it is all in vain, they shall come to want. They that rob God, and so make him their Enemy, cannot secure themselves by giving to the rich, to make them their friends.

17. Bow down thine ear, and hear the words of the wise, and apply thine heart unto my knowledge. 18. For it is a pleasant thing if thou keep them within thee; they shall wilhal be fitted in thy lips. 19. That thy trust may be in the LORD, I have made known to thee this day, even to thee. 20. Have not I written to thee excellent things in counsels and knowledge; 21. That I might make thee know the certainty of the words of truth; that thou mightest answer the words of truth to them that send unto thee?

Solomon here changes his style and manner of speaking; hitherto, for the most part, since the beginning of ch. 10. he had laid down doctrinal truths, and but now and then dropt a word of exhortation, leaving us to make the application as we went along; but here, to the end of ch. 24. he directs his speech to his son, his pupil, to his reader, his hearer, speaking as to a particular person: hitherto, for the most part, his sense was comprised in one verse, but here usually it is drawn out further. See how Wisdom tries variety of methods with us, lest we should be cloyed with any one. We are addressed, in order that our attention may be awakened, and our application assisted. Ministers must not think it enough to preach before their hearers, but must preach to them; nor enough to preach to them all in general, but should apply themselves to particular persons, as here; Do thou do so and so. Here is,

I. An earnest exhortation to get wisdom and grace, by attending to the words of the wise men, both written and preached; the words of the prophets and priests; and particularly to that knowledge which Solomon, in this book, gives men of good and evil, sin and duty, rewards and punishments. To these words, to this knowledge, the ear must be bowed down, in humility and serious attention; and the heart applied by faith, and love, and close consideration. The ear will not serve without the heart.

II. Arguments to enforce this exhortation. Consider,

1. The worth and weight of the things themselves, which Solomon in this book gives us the knowledge of; they are not trivial things, for amusement and diversion, not jocular proverbs, to be repeated in sport, and in order to pass away time; no, they are excellent things, which concern the glory of God, the holiness and happiness of our souls, the welfare of mankind, and all communities; they are princely things, so the word is, fit for kings to speak, and senates to hear; they are things that concern counsels and knowledge, wise counsels, relating to the most important concerns; things which will not only make us knowing ourselves, but enable us to advise others.

2. The clearness of the discovery of these things, and the directing of them to us in particular. They are made known, publicly known, that all may read; plainly known, that he that runs may read; made known this day, more fully than ever before, in this day of light and knowledge; made known in this thy day; but it is only a little while that this light is with thee; perhaps the things that are this day made known to thee, if thou improve not the day of thy visitation, may, before to-morrow, be hid from thine eyes. They are written, for the greater certainty, and that they may be received, and transmitted, pure and entire, to posterity; but that which the emphasis is here most laid upon, is, that they are made known to thee, even to thee, and written to thee, as if it were a letter directed to thee by name; it is suited to thee and to thy case, thou mayest in this glass see thine own face; it is intended for thee, to be a rule to thee, and by it thou must be judged. We cannot say of these things, They are good things, but they are nothing to us; no, they are of the greatest concern imaginable to us.

3. The agreeableness of these things to us, in respect both of comfort and credit. (1.) If we hide them in our hearts, they will be very pleasing, and yield us an abundant satisfaction; (v. 18.) "It is a pleasant thing, and will be thy constant entertainment, if thou keep them within thee; if thou digest them, and be actuated and governed by them, and delivered into them as into a mould." The form of godliness, when that is rested in, is but a force put upon a man, and he does but do penance in that white clothing; those only that submit to the power of godliness, and make heart-work of it, find the pleasure of it, ch. 2. 10. (2.) If we make use of them in our discourse, they will be very becoming, and gain us a good reputation; they shall be fitted in thy lips; "Speak of these things, and thou speakest like thyself, and as is fit for thee to speak, considering thy character; thou wilt also have pleasure in speaking of these things, as well as in thinking of them."

4. The advantage designed us by them. The excellent things which God hath written to us are not like the commands which the master gives his servant, which are all intended for the benefit of the master, but like those which the master gives his scholar, which are all intended for the benefit of the scholar. These things must be kept by us, for they are written to us,

(1.) That we may have a confidence in God, and so may have comfort in him, and communion with him; that thy trust may be in the Lord, v. 19. We cannot trust in God, except in the way of duty; we are, therefore, taught our duty, that we may have reason to trust in God. Nay, this is itself one great duty we are to learn, and a duty that is the foundation of all practical religion, to live a life of delight in God, and dependence on him.

(2.) That we may have a satisfaction in our own judgment; "That I might make thee know the certainty of the words of truth."

* A corruption of the word hospital, denoting here any charitable foundation.—ED.

That thou mayest know what is truth, mayest plainly distinguish between it and falsehood, and mayest know upon what grounds thou receivest and believest the truths of God." Note, [1.] It is a desirable thing to know, not only the words of truth, but the certainly of them; that our faith may be intelligent and rational, and may grow up to a full assurance. [2.] The way to know the certainty of the words of truth, is, to make conscience of our duty; for if any man do his will, he shall know for certain that the doctrine is of God, John, 7. 17.

(3.) That we may be useful and serviceable to others for their instruction; "That thou mayest give a good account of the words of truth to them that send to thee to consult thee as an oracle;" or, as the margin reads it, "to those that send thee, that employ thee as an agent or ambassador in any business." Knowledge is given us to do good with, that others may light their candle at our lamp, and that we may in our place serve our generation according to the will of God. And those who make conscience of keeping God's commandments will be best able to give a reason of the hope that is in them.

22. Rob not the poor, because he is poor: neither oppress the afflicted in the gate: 23. For the LORD will plead their cause, and spoil the soul of those that spoiled them.

After this solemn preface, one would have expected something new and surprising; no: here is a plain and common, but very needful, caution against the barbarous and inhuman practice of oppressing poor people. Observe,

1. The sin itself, and that is, robbing the poor, and making them poorer; taking from those that have but little to lose, and so leaving them nothing. It is bad to rob any man, but most absurd to rob the poor, whom we should relieve; to squeeze those with our power, whom we should water with our bounty; to oppress the afflicted, and so to add affliction to them; to give judgment against them, and so to patronise those that do rob them; which is as bad as if we robbed them ourselves. Rich men will not suffer themselves to be wronged, poor men cannot help it, and therefore we ought to be the more careful not to wrong them.

2. The aggravations of the sin. (1.) If their inability, by reason of their poverty, to right themselves, imbolden us to rob them, it is so much the worse; that is robbing the poor because he is poor; this is not only a base and cowardly thing, to take advantage against a man because he is helpless, but it is unnatural, and bespeaks men worse than beasts. (2.) Or if it be done under colour of law and justice, that is oppressing the afflicted in the gate, where they ought to be protected from wrong, and to have justice done them against those that oppress them.

3. The danger that attends this sin. He that robs and oppresses the poor, it is at his peril; for, (1.) The oppressed will find God their powerful Patron; he will plead their cause, and not suffer them to be run down and trampled upon. If men will not appear for them, God will. (2.) The oppressors will find him a just Avenger; he will make reprisals upon them, will spoil the souls of those that spoil them; he will repay them in spiritual judgments, in curses to their souls. He that robs the poor will be found in the end a murderer of himself.

24. Make no friendship with an angry man; and with a furious man thou shalt not go: 25. Lest thou learn his ways, and get a snare to thy soul.

Here is, 1. A good caution against being intimate with a passionate man. It is the law of friendship that we accommodate ourselves to our friends, and be ready to serve them, and therefore we ought to be wise and wary in the choice of a friend, that we come not under that sacred tie to any one whom it would be our folly to accommodate ourselves to; though we must be civil to all, yet we must be careful whom we lay in our bosoms, and contract a familiarity with. And, among others, a man who is easily provoked, touchy, and apt to resent affronts, who, when he is in a passion, cares not what he says or does, but grows outrageous, such a one is not fit to be made a friend or companion, for he will be ever and anon angry with us, and that will be our trouble, and will expect that we should, like him, be angry with others, and that will be our sin.

2. Good cause given for this caution; lest thou learn his way. Those we go with we are apt to grow like. Our corrupt hearts have so much tinder in them, that it is dangerous conversing with those that throw about the sparks of their passion; we shall thereby get a snare to our souls, for a disposition to anger is a great snare to any man, and an occasion of much sin. He does not say, "Lest thou have ill language given thee, or get a broken head," but, which is much worse, "Lest thou imitate him, to humour him, and so contract an ill habit."

26. Be not thou one of them that strike hands, or of them that are sureties for debts. 27. If thou hast nothing to pay, why should he take away thy bed from under thee?

We have here, as often before, a caution against suretiship, as a thing both imprudent and unjust.

1. We must not associate ourselves, nor contract an intimacy, with men of broken fortunes and reputations, who need, and will urge their friends to be bound for them, that they may cheat their neighbours, to feed their lusts, and, by keeping up a little longer, may do the more damage at last to those that give them credit. Have nothing to do with such; be not thou among them.

2. We must not cheat people of their money, by striking hands ourselves, or becoming surety for others, when we have not to pay. If a man by the Divine Providence is disabled to pay his debts, he ought to be pitied and helped, but he that takes up money or goods himself, or is bound for another, when he knows that he has not wherewithal to pay, or that which he has is so settled, that the creditors cannot come at it, he does in effect pick his neighbour's pocket, and though, in all cases, compassion is to be used, yet he may thank himself if the law have its course, and his bed be taken from under him, which might not be taken for a pawn to secure a debt, Exod. 22. 26, 27. For if a man appeared to be so poor that he had nothing else to give for security, he ought to be relieved, and it was honestly done to own it; but for the recovery of a debt, it seems it might be taken by the summum jus—the strict operation of law.

3. We must not ruin our own estates and families: every man ought to be just to himself, and to his wife and children; those are not so who live above what they have, who, by the mismanagement of their own affairs, or by incumbering themselves with the debts of others, waste what they have, and bring themselves to poverty. We may take joyfully the spoiling of our goods, if it be for the testimony of a good conscience; but if it be for our own rashness and folly, we cannot but take it heavily.

28. Remove not the ancient land-mark which thy fathers have set.

1. We are here taught not to invade another man's right, though we can find ways of doing it ever so secretly and plausibly, clandestinely and by fraud, without any open force. Let not property in general be entrenched upon, by robbing men of their liberties and privileges, or of any just ways of maintaining them. Let not the property of particular persons be encroached upon; the land-marks, or meer-stones, are standing witnesses to every man's right, let not those be removed quite away, for thence come wars, and fightings, and endless disputes; let them not be removed so as to take from thy neighbour's lot to thine own; for that is downright robbing him, and entailing of the fraud upon posterity.

2. We may infer hence, that a deference is to be paid, in all civil matters, to usages that have prevailed time out of mind, and the settled constitutions of government, in which it becomes us to acquiesce; lest an attempt to change it, under pretence of changing it for the better, prove of dangerous consequence.

29. Seest thou a man diligent in his business? He shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before mean men.

Here is, 1. A plain intimation, what a hard thing it is to find a truly ingenious, industrious man; "Seest thou a man diligent in his business? Thou wilt not see many such, so epidemical are dulness and slothfulness." He is here commended, who lays out himself to get business, though it be but in a very low and narrow sphere, and is not easy when he is out of business, who loves business, is quick and active in it, and goes through it, not only with constancy and resolution, but with dexterity and expedition, a man of dispatch, who knows how to bring a deal of business into a little compass.

2. A moral prognostication of the preferment of such a man; though now he stands before mean men, is employed by them, and attends upon them, yet he will rise, and is likely enough to stand before kings, as an ambassador to foreign kings, or prime minister of state to his own. Seest thou a man diligent in the business of religion? He is likely to excel in virtue, and shall stand before the King of kings.

CHAP. XXIII.

1. WHEN thou sittest to eat with a ruler, consider diligently what is before thee:
2. And put a knife to thy throat, if thou be a man given to appetite. 3. Be not desirous of his dainties: for they are deceitful meat.

The sin we are here warned against, is, luxury and sensuality, and the indulgence of the appetite in eating and drinking, a sin that most easily besets us.

1. We are here told when we enter into temptation, and are in most danger of falling into this sin; "When thou sittest to eat with a ruler, thou hast great plenty before thee, varieties and dainties, such a table as thou hast seldom seen; thou art ready to think, as Haman did, of nothing but the honour hereby done thee; (Esth. 5. 12.) and the opportunity thou hast of pleasing thy palate, and forgettest that there is a snare laid for thee." Perhaps the temptation may be stronger and more dangerous to one that is not used to such entertainments, than to one that always sits down to a good table.

2. We are here bid to double our guard at such a time. We must, (1.) Apprehend ourselves to be in danger; "Consider diligently what is before thee, what meat and drink are before thee, that thou mayest choose that which is safest for thee, and which thou art least likely to eat and drink of to excess. Consider what company is before thee, the ruler himself, who, if he be wise and good, will take it as an affront for any of his guests to disorder themselves at his table." And if when we sit to eat with a ruler, much more when we sit to eat with the Ruler of rulers at the Lord's table, must we consider diligently what is before us, that we may not in any respect eat and drink unworthily, unbecomingly, lest that table become a snare. (2.) We must alarm ourselves into temperance and moderation; "Put a knife to thy throat, restrain thyself, as it were with a sword hanging over thy head, from all excess. Let these words, Take heed lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and so that day come upon you at unawares; or those, For all these things God shall bring thee into judgment; or those, Drunkards shall not inherit the kingdom of God; be a knife to the throat." The Latins call luxury, gula—the throat; "Take up arms against that sin. Rather be so abstemious, that thy craving appetite will begin to think thy throat cut, than indulge thyself in voluptuousness." We must never feed ourselves without fear, (Jude, 12.) but we must in a special manner fear when temptation is before us. (3.) We must reason ourselves into a holy contempt of the gratifications of sense; "If thou be a man given to appetite, thou must, by a present resolution, and an application of the terrors of the Lord, restrain thyself. When thou art in danger of falling into any excess, put a knife to thy throat; that may serve for once.

But that is not enough, lay the axe to the root, mortify that appetite which has such a power over thee, be not desirous of dainties." Note, We ought to observe what is our own iniquity, and, if we find ourselves addicted to flesh-pleasing, we must not only stand upon our guard against temptations from without, but subdue the corruption within. Nature is desirous of food, and we are taught to pray for it, but it is lust that is desirous of dainties, and we cannot in faith pray for them, for frequently they are not food convenient either for mind, body, or estate. They are deceitful meat, and therefore David, instead of praying for them, prays against them, Ps. 141. 4. They are pleasant to the palate, but perhaps rise in the stomach, turn sour there, upbraid a man, and make him sick. They do not yield men the satisfaction they promised themselves from them; for those that are given to appetite, when they have that which is very dainty, are not pleased, they are soon weary of it, they must have something else more dainty; the more a luxurious appetite is humoured and indulged, the more humoursome and troublesome it grows, and the more hard to please; dainties will surfeit, but never satisfy. But especially they are, upon this account, deceitful meat, that, while they please the body, they prejudice the soul, they over-charge the heart, and unfit it for the service of God, nay, they take away the heart, and alienate the mind, from spiritual delights, and spoil its relish of them. Why then should we covet that which will certainly cheat us?

4. Labour not to be rich: cease from thine own wisdom. 5. Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? For riches certainly make themselves wings; they flee away as an eagle towards heaven.

As some are given to appetite, (v. 2.) so others to covetousness, and those Solomon here takes to task. Men cheat themselves as much by setting their hearts on money (though it seems most substantial) as by setting them on dainties. Observe,

1. How he dissuades the covetous man from toiling and tormenting himself; (v. 4.) "Do not aim to be rich; to raise an estate, and to make what thou hast in abundance, more than it is." We must endeavour to live comfortably, and provide for our children and families, according as our rank and condition are, but we must not seek great things. Be not of those that will be rich, that desire it as their chief good, and design it as their highest end, 1 Tim. 6. 9. Covetous men think it is their wisdom, imagining that if they be rich to such a degree, they shall be completely happy; cease from that wisdom, for it is a mistake, a man's life consists not in the abundance of the things which he possesses, Luke, 12. 15. Those that aim at great things,

1. "They fill their hands with business more than they can grasp, so that their life is both a perfect drudgery and a perpetual hurry; but be not thou such a fool, labour not to be rich. What thou hast and doest, be master of it, and not a slave to it, as those that rise up early, sit up late, and eat the bread of carefulness, and all to be rich." Moderate labour, that we may have to give, is our wisdom and duty, Eph. 4. 28. Immoderate labour, that we may have to hoard, is our sin and folly.

2. "They fill their heads with projects more than they understand, so that their life is a constant toss of care and fear; but do not thou vex thyself, cease from thine own wisdom, go on quietly in the way of thy business, not contriving new ways, and setting thy wits on work to find out new inventions. Acquiesce in God's wisdom, and cease from thine own, ch. 3. 5, 6.

II. How he dissuades the covetous man from cheating and deceiving himself by an inordinate love and pursuit of that which is vanity and vexation of spirit; for,

1. It is not substantial and satisfying; "Wilt thou be such a fool as to set thine eyes, to cause thine eyes to fly with eagerness and violence, upon that which is not?" Note, (1.) The things of this world are things that are not. They have a real existence in nature, and are the real gifts of Providence, but in the kingdom of grace they are things that are not; they are not a happiness and portion for a soul; are not what they promise to be, nor what we expect them to be; they are a shew, a shadow, a sham upon the soul that trusts to them; they are not, for in a little while they will not be, they will not be our's, they perish in the using; the fashion of them passes away. (2.) It is therefore folly for us to set our eyes upon them; to admire them as the best things, and appropriate them to ourselves as our good things, and to aim at them as our mark at which all our actions are levelled; to fly upon them as the eagle upon her prey. "Wilt thou do a thing so absurd in itself? What, thou a reasonable creature, wilt thou dote upon shadows? The eyes are put for rational and intellectual powers; wilt thou throw those away upon such undeserving objects? To set the hands and feet upon the world is well enough, but not the eyes the eyes of the mind, those were made to contemplate better things. Wilt thou, my son, that professest religion, put such an affront upon God, (toward whom thine eyes should ever be,) and such an abuse upon thy own soul?"

2. It is not durable and abiding; Riches are very uncertain things, certainly they are so, they make themselves wings, and flee away. The more we cause our eyes to fly upon them, the more likely they are to flee away from us. (1.) Riches will leave us; those that hold them ever so fast, cannot hold them always, cannot hold them long; either they must be taken from us, or we must be taken from them. The goods are said to flow away as a stream, (Job, 20. 28.) here to flee away as a bird. (2.) Perhaps they may leave us suddenly; when we have taken a great deal of pains for them, and begin to take a great deal of pride and pleasure in them. The covetous man sits hatching upon his wealth, and brooding over it till it is fledged, as the young ones under the hen, and then it is gone. Or, as if a man should be fond of a flight of wild-fowl that light in his field, and call them his own, because they are upon his ground, whereas if he offer to come near them, they take wing immediately, and are gone to another man's field. (3.) The wings they flee away upon are of their own making; they have in themselves the principles of their own corruption, their own moth and rust. They are wasting in their own nature, and like a handful of dust, which if it be grasped, slips through the fingers. Snow will last a while, and look pretty, if it be left to lie on the ground where it fell, but if gathered up and laid in the bosom, it is dissolved and gone immediately. (4.) They go irresistibly and irrecoverably, as an eagle toward heaven, that flies strongly, there is no stopping her, and flies out of sight and out of call, there is no bringing her back; thus do riches leave men, and leave them in grief and vexation, if they set their hearts upon them.

6. Eat thou not the bread of him that hath an evil eye, neither desire thou his dainty meats: 7. For as he thinketh in his heart, so is he: Eat and drink, saith he to thee; but his heart is not with thee. 8. The morsel which thou hast eaten shalt thou vomit up, and lose thy sweet words.

Those that are voluptuous, and given to appetite, (v. 2.) are glad to be where there is good cheer stirring, and those that are covetous and saving, that they may spare at home, will be glad to get a dinner at another man's table; and therefore both are here advised not to be forward to accept of every man's invitation, but especially not to thrust themselves in, uninvited. Observe,

1. There are those that pretend to bid their friends welcome, that are not hearty and sincere in it. They have a fair tongue, and know what they should say; Eat and drink, saith he, because it is expected that the master of the feast should so compliment his guests; but they have an evil eye, and grudge their guests every bit they eat, especially if they eat freely. They would seem to be liberal in making the entertainment, and would have the credit of it, but they have so great a love to their money, and so little to their friends, that they cannot have the comfort of it, nor any enjoyment of themselves or their friends. The miser's feast is his penance. If a man be so very selfish, and sordid, that he cannot find in his heart to bid his friends welcome to what he has, he ought not to add to that the guilt of dissimulation by inviting them, but let him own himself to be what he is, that the vile person may not be called liberal, or the churl bountiful, Isa. 32. 5.

2. One can have no comfort in accepting the entertainments that are given grudgingly; "Eat not thou the bread of such a man, let him keep it to himself. Do not sponge upon those that are bountiful, nor make thyself burthensome to any; but especially scorn to be beholden to those that are paltry, and not sincere. Better have a dinner of herbs and true welcome, than dainty meats without it. Therefore," (1.) "Judge of the man as his mind is; thou thinkest to pay thy respect to him as a friend, so thou takest him to be, because he speaks fair, but, as he thinks in his heart, so is he, not as he speaks with his tongue." We are that really, both to God and man, which we are inwardly; and neither religion nor friendship is worth any thing further than as it is sincere. (2.) "Judge of the meat, as the digestion is, and as it agrees with thee. He bids thee eat freely, but, first or last, he will discover his sordid covetous humour, and as he thinks in his heart, so he will look and give thee to understand that thou art not welcome, and then the morsel thou hast eaten thou shalt vomit up, the very thought of that will make thee even to vomit the meat thou hast eaten, and eat the words thou hast spoken in returning his compliments, and giving him thanks for his civilities. Thou shalt lose thy sweet words which he has given thee, and thou hast given him."

9. Speak not in the ears of a fool: for he will despise the wisdom of thy words.

We are here directed not to cast pearls before swine, (Matth. 7. 6.) and not to expose things sacred to the contempt and ridicule of profane scoffers. It is our duty to take all fit occasions to speak of divine things; but,

1. There are some that will make a jest of every thing, though it be ever so prudently and pertinently spoken; that will not only despise a wise man's words, but despise even the wisdom of them, that in them which is most improvable for their own edification; they will particularly reproach that, as if it had an ill design upon them, which they must guard against.

2. Those that do so forfeit the benefit of good advice and instruction, and a wise man is not only allowed, but advised, not to speak in the ears of such fools; let them be foolish still, and let not precious breath be thrown away upon them. If what a wise man says in his wisdom will not be heard, let him hold his peace, and try whether the wisdom of that will be regarded.

10. Remove not the old land-mark; and enter not into the fields of the fatherless: 11. For their redeemer is mighty; he shall plead their cause with thee.

Note, 1. The fatherless are taken under God's special protection; with him they not only find mercy shewed to them, (Hos. 14. 3.) but justice done for them. He is their Redeemer, their Goel, their near Kinsman, that will take their part, and stand up for them with jealousy, as taking himself affronted in the injuries done to them. As their Redeemer, he will plead their cause against those that do them any injury, and, one way or other, will not only defend their right, and recover it for them, but avenge the wrongs done to them. And he is mighty, almighty; his omnipotence is engaged and employed for their protection, which their proudest and most powerful oppressors will find themselves an unequal match for; and that it is at their peril to contend with it.

2. Every man therefore must be careful not to injure them in any thing, or to invade their rights; either by a clandestine removal of the old land-marks, or by a forcible entry into their fields. Being fatherless, they have none to right them, and, being in their childhood, they do not so much as apprehend the wrong that is done them. Sense of honour, and much more the fear of God, should restrain men from offering any injury to children, especially fatherless children.

12. Apply thine heart unto instruction, and thine ears to the words of knowledge. 13. Withhold not correction from the child: for if thou beatest him with the rod, he shall not die. 14. Thou shalt beat him with the rod, and shalt deliver his soul from hell. 15. My son, if thine heart be wise, my heart shall rejoice, even mine. 16. Yea, my reins shall rejoice, when thy lips speak right things.

Here is, 1. A parent instructing his child. He is here brought in, persuading him to give his mind to his book, and especially to the scriptures and his catechism; to attend to the words of knowledge, by which he might come to know his duty, and danger, and interest, and not to think it enough to give them the hearing, but to apply his heart to them, to delight in them, and bow his will to the authority of them. The heart is then applied to the instruction, when the instruction is applied to the heart.

2. A parent correcting his child. A tender parent can scarcely find in his heart to do it, it goes much against the grain, but he finds it is necessary, it is his duty, and therefore he dares not withhold correction when there is occasion for it; (spare the rod, and spoil the child;) he beats him with the rod, gives him a gentle correction, the stripes of the sons of men, not such as we give to beasts. Beat him with the rod, and he shall not die; the rod will not kill him; nay, it will prevent his killing himself by those vicious courses which the rod will be necessary to restrain him from. For the present, it is not joyous but grievous, both to the parent and to the child; but, when it is given with wisdom, designed for good, accompanied with prayer, and blessed of God, it may prove a happy means of preventing his utter destruction, and delivering his soul from hell. Our great care must be about our children's souls, we must not see them in danger of hell, without using all possible means, with the utmost care and concern, to snatch them as brands out of everlasting burnings. Let the body smart, so that the spirit be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

3. A parent encouraging his child, telling him, (1.) What was all he expected; nothing but what would be for his own good, that his heart be wise, and that his lips speak right things; that he be under the government of good principles, and that by those principles he particularly maintain a good government of his tongue. It is to be hoped, that those will do right things, when they grow up, who learn to speak right things when they are young, and dare not speak any bad words. (2.) What a comfort it would be to him, if herein he answered his expectation; "If thy heart be wise, my heart shall rejoice, shall rejoice in thee; even mine, who have taken so much care and pains about thee, my heart, that has many a time ached for thee, for which thou shouldest study thus to make a grateful requital." Note, The wisdom of children will be the joy of their parents and teachers, who have no greater joy than to see them walk in the truth, 3 John, 4. "Children, if you be wise and good, devout and conscientious, God will be pleased with you, and that will be our joy: we shall think our labour, in instructing you, well bestowed; it will be a comfortable answer for the many prayers we have put up for you; we shall be eased of a great deal of care, shall not need to be so strict and severe in watching over you, and shall, consequently, be the easier, both to you and to ourselves. We shall rejoice in hope that you will be a credit and comfort to us, if we should live to be old, that you will bear up the name of Christ in your generation, that you will live comfortably in this world, and happily in another."

17. Let not thine heart envy sinners: but be thou in the fear of the LORD all the day long: 18. For surely there is an end; and thine expectation shall not be cut off.

Here is, 1. A necessary caution against entertaining any favourable thoughts of prospering profaneness; "Let not thine heart envy sinners; do not grudge them either the liberty they take to sin, or the success they have in sin, it will cost them dear, and they are to be pitied rather than envied. Their prosperity is their portion, (Ps. 17. 14.) nay, it is their poison," Prov. 1. 32. We must not harbour in our hearts any secret discontent at the providence of God, though it seem to smile upon them, nor wish ourselves in their condition. "Let not thine heart imitate sinners," (so some read it,) do not as they do, walk not in the way with them, use not the methods they take to enrich themselves, though they thrive by them.

2. An excellent direction to maintain high thoughts of God in our minds at all times, Be thou in the fear of the Lord every day, and all the day long. We must be in the fear of the Lord, as in our employment, exercising ourselves in holy adorings of God, in subjection to his precepts, submission to his providences, and a constant care to please him; we must be in it as in our element, taking a pleasure in contemplating God's glory, and complying with his will. It is to be devoted to his fear, (Ps. 119. 38.) and governed by it as our commanding principle in all we say and do. All the days of our life we must constantly keep up an awe of God upon our spirits, must pay a deference to his authority, and have a dread of his wrath. We must be always so in his fear as never to be out of it.

3. A good reason for both of these; (v. 18.) Surely there is an end, an end and expectation, as Jer. 29. 11. There will be an end of the prosperity of the wicked, therefore do not envy them; (Ps. 73. 17.) there will be an end of thy afflictions, therefore be not weary of them; an end of thy services, thy work and warfare will be accomplished, perfect love will cast out fear, and thine expectation of the reward not only will be not cut off, or disappointed, but it will be infinitely out-done. The consideration of the end will help to reconcile us to all the difficulties and discouragements of the way.

19. Hear thou, my son, and be wise, and guide thine heart in the way. 20. Be not amongst winebibbers; amongst riotous eaters of flesh: 21. For the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty: and drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags. 22. Hearken unto thy father that begat thee, and despise not thy mother when she is old. 23. Buy the truth, and sell it not; also wisdom, and instruction, and understanding. 24. The father of the righteous shall greatly rejoice: and he that begetteth a wise child shall have joy of him. 25. Thy father and thy mother shall be glad, and she that bare thee shall rejoice. 26. My son, give me thine heart, and let thine eyes observe my ways. 27. For an whore is a deep ditch; and a strange woman is a narrow pit. 28. She also lieth in wait as for a prey, and increaseth the transgressors among men.

Here is good advice for parents to give to their children; words are put into their mouths, that they may train them up in the way they should go. Here we have,

1. An earnest call to young people to attend to the advice of their godly parents, not only to this that is here given, but to all other profitable instructions; "Hear, my son, and be wise, v. 19. This will be an evidence that thou art wise, and a means to make thee wiser." Wisdom, as Faith, comes by hearing. And again, (v. 22.) "Hearken unto thy father who begat thee, and who therefore has an authority over thee, and an affection for thee, and, thou mayest be sure, can have no other design than thine own good." We ought to give reverence to the fathers of our flesh, who begat us, and were the instruments of our being; much more ought we to obey, and be in subjection to, the Father of our spirits, who made us, and is the Author of our being. And since the mother also, from a sense of duty to God, and in love to her child, g^o him good instructions, let him not despise her, or her advice, when she is old. When the mother is grown old, we may suppose the children to be grown up; but let them not think themselves past being taught, even by her, but rather respect her the more for the multitude of her years, and the wisdom which they teach. Scornful and insolent young men will make a jest, it may be, of the good advice of an aged mother, and think themselves not concerned to heed what an old woman says; but such will have a great deal to answer for another day, not only as having set at nought good counsel, but as having slighted and grieved a good mother, ch. 30. 17.

II. An argument to enforce this call, taken from the great comfort which this will be to their parents, v. 24, 25. Note, 1. It is the duty of children to study how they may rejoice the hearts of their good parents, and do it yet more and more, so that they may greatly rejoice in them, even when the evil days come, and the years of which they say they have no pleasure in them, but this, to see their children do well; as Barzillai to see Chimham preferred. 2. Children will be a joy to their parents, if they be righteous and wise. Righteousness is true wisdom; they who do good, do well for themselves. Those are completely such as they should be, who are not only wise, knowing and learned, but righteous, honest and good; and not only righteous, conscientious and well-meaning, but wise, prudent and discreet in the management of themselves. If such the children be, especially all the children, the father and mother will be glad, and think nothing too much that they have done, or do, for them; they will please themselves in them, and give God thanks for them; particularly she that bare them with pain, and nursed them with pains, will rejoice in them, and reckon herself well-requited, and the sorrow more than forgotten, because a wise and good man is the product of it, who is a blessing to the world he was born into.

III. Some general precepts of wisdom and virtue.

1. Guide thine heart in the way, v. 19. It is the heart that must be taken care of, and directed aright; the motions and affections of the soul must be toward right objects, and under a steady guidance. If the heart be guided in the way, the steps will be guided, and the conversation well-ordered.

2. Buy the truth, and sell it not, v. 23. Truth is that by which the heart must be guided and governed, for without truth there is no goodness; no regular practices without right principles. It is by the power of truth, known and believed, that we must be kept back from sin, and constrained to duty; the understanding must be well-informed with wisdom and instruction. And therefore, (1.) We must buy it, be willing to part with any thing for it. He does not say at what rate we must buy it, because we cannot buy it too dear, but must have it at any rate; whatever it costs us, we shall not repent the bargain. When we are at expence for the means of knowledge, and resolved not to starve so good a cause, then we buy the truth. Riches should be employed for the getting of knowledge, rather than knowledge for the getting of riches. When we are at pains in searching after truth, that we may come to the knowledge of it, and may distinguish between it and error, then we buy it. Dii laboribus annia vendunt—Heaven concedes every thing to the laborious. When we choose rather to suffer loss in our temporal interest, than to deny or neglect the truth, then we buy it; and it is a pearl of such great price, that we must be willing to part with all to purchase it, must make shipwreck of estate, trade, preferment, rather than of faith and a good conscience. (2.) We must not sell it; do not part with it for pleasures, honours, riches, any thing in this world; do not neglect the study of it, nor throw off the profession of it, nor revolt from under the dominion of it, for the getting or saving of any secular interest whatsoever. Hold fast the form of sound words, and never let it go upon any terms.

3. Give me thine heart, v. 26. God, in this exhortation, speaks to us as unto children; Son, Daughter, Give me thy heart. The heart is that which the great God requires and calls for from every one of us; whatever we give, if we do not give him our hearts, it will not be accepted. We must set our love upon him. Our thoughts must converse much with him, and on him, as our highest End; the intents of our hearts must be fastened. We must make it our own act and deed to devote ourselves to the Lord, and we must be free and cheerful in it. We must not think to divide the heart between God and the world; he will have all or none; Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart. To this call we must readily answer, "My Father, take my heart, such as it is, and make it such as it should be; take possession of it, and set up thy throne in it."

4. Let thine eyes observe my ways; have an eye to the rule of God's word, the conduct of his providence, and the good examples of his people. Our eyes must observe these, as he that writes observes his copy, that we may keep in the right paths, and may proceed and persevere in them.

IV. Some particular cautions against those sins which are, of all others, the most destructive to the seeds of wisdom and grace in the soul, which impoverish and ruin it.

1. Gluttony and drunkenness, v. 20, 21. The world is full of examples of this sin, and temptations to it, which all young people are concerned to stand upon their guard against, and keep at a distance from. Be not a wine-bibber; we are allowed to drink a little wine, (1 Tim. 5. 23.) but not much; not to make a trade of it, never to drink to excess. Be not a riotous eater of flesh, as the Israelites were, who lusted exceedingly after it, saying, Who will give us flesh to eat? Whereas Paul, though he is free to eat flesh, yet resolves that he will eat no flesh while the world stands, rather than make his brother to offend; so indifferent is he to it, 1 Cor. 8. 13. Be not an excessive eater of flesh; intemperance must be avoided in meat as well as drink. Be not a luxurious eater of flesh; not pleased with any thing but what is very nice and delicate, savoury dishes, and forced meat. Some take not only a pleasure, but a pride, in being curious about their diet, and, as they call it, eating well; as if that were the ornament of a gentleman which is really the shame of a Christian; making a God of the belly. "Be not a wine-bibber, and be not a riotous eater; and therefore, be not among wine-bibbers, nor among riotous eaters; do not give them countenance, lest thou learn their ways, and insensibly fall into those sins, or at least lose the dread and detestation of them. They covet to have thee among them; for those that are debauched themselves are very desirous to debauch others; therefore do not gratify them, lest thou endanger thyself." He fetches an argument against this sin from the expensiveness of it, and its tendency to impoverish men: and if men will not be deterred from it by the ruin it brings on their secular interests, which lie nearest their hearts, no marvel that they are not frightened from it by what they are told out of the word of God of the mischief it does them in their spiritual and eternal concerns. The drunken and the glutton hate to be reformed, though they are told they shall come to poverty; nay, though they are told they shall come to hell. Drunkenness is the cause of drowsiness; it stupifies men, and makes them inattentive to business, and then all goes to wreck and ruin: thus men that have lived creditably come to be clothed with rags.

2. Whoredom: that is another sin which takes away the heart that should be given to God, Hos. 4. 11. He shews the danger which attends that sin, v. 27, 28

(1.) It is a sin from which few recover themselves, when once they are entangled in it. It is like a deep ditch, and a narrow pit, which it is almost impossible to get out of; and therefore it is wisdom to keep far enough from the brink of it. Take heed of making any approaches toward this sin, because it is so hard to make a retreat from it; conscience, which should head the retreat, being debauched by it, and divine grace forfeited.

(2.) It is a sin which bewitches men to their ruin; The adulteress lies in wait as a robber, pretending friendship, but designing the greatest mischief, to rob them of all they have that is valuable, to strip them both of their armour, and of their ornaments. Even those who, being virtuously educated, endeavour to shun the adulteress, she will lie in wait for, that she may assault them when they are off their guard, and she has them at an advantage. Let none, therefore, be at any time secure.

(3.) It is a sin that contributes more than any other to the spreading of vice and immorality in a kingdom; It increases the transgressors among men. One adulteress may be the ruin of many a precious soul, and may help to debauch a whole town. It increases the treacherous or perfidious ones; it not only occasions husbands to be false to their wives, and servants to their masters, but many that have professed religion, to throw off their profession, and break their covenants with God. Houses of uncleanness are therefore such pest-houses as ought to be suppressed by those whose office it is to take care of the public welfare.

29. Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babbling? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? 30. They that tarry long at the wine; they that go to seek mixed wine. 31. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. 32. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder. 33. Thine eyes shall behold strange women, and thine heart shall utter perverse things. 34. Yea, thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast. 35. They have stricken me, shalt thou say, and I was not sick; they have beaten me, and I felt it not: when shall I awake? I will seek it yet again.

Solomon here gives fair warning against the sin of drunkenness, to confirm what he had said, v. 20.

I. He cautions all people to keep out of the way of temptations to this sin; (v. 31.) Look not thou upon the wine when it is red. Red wine was in Canaan looked upon as the best wine, it is therefore called the blood of the grape. Critics judge of wine, among other indications, by the colour of it; some wine, they say, looks charmingly, looks so well, that it even says, "Come and drink me;" it moves itself aright, goes down very smoothly, or perhaps the roughness of it is grateful. It is said of generous, strong-bodied, wine, that it even causes the lips of those that are asleep to speak, Cant. 7. 9. But look not thou upon it. 1. "Be not ruled by sense, but reason and religion; covet not that which pleases the eye, in hopes that it will please the taste, but let thy serious thoughts correct the errors of thy senses, and convince thee that that which seems delightful is really hurtful, and resolve against it accordingly. Let not the heart walk after the eye, for it is a deceitful guide." 2. "Be not too bold with the charms of this or any other sin; look not, lest thou lust, lest thou take the forbidden fruit." Note, Those that would be kept from any sin, must keep themselves from all the occasions and beginnings of it, and be afraid of coming within the reach of its allurements, lest they be overcome by them.

II. He shews the many pernicious consequences of the sin of drunkenness, for the enforcement of this caution. Take heed of the bait, for fear of the hook; At the last, it bites, v. 32. All sin will be bitterness in the end, and this sin particularly. It bites like a serpent; when the drunkard is made sick by his surfeit, thrown by it into a dropsy, or some fatal disease, beggared and ruined in his estate, especially when his conscience is awakened, and he cannot reflect upon it without horror and indignation at himself; but, worst of all, at last, when the cup of drunkenness shall be turned into a cup of trembling, the cup of the Lord's wrath, the dregs of which he must be for ever drinking, and shall not have a drop of water to cool his inflamed tongue. To take off the force of the temptation that there is in the pleasure of the sin, foresee the punishment of it, and what it will at last end in, if repentance prevent not. In its latter end it bites, so the word is; think, therefore, what will be in the end thereof.

But he chooses to specify those pernicious consequences of this sin, which are present and sensible.

1. It embroils men in quarrels, makes them quarrel with others, and say and do that which gives others occasion to quarrel with them, v. 29. He asks, Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? Who has not, in this world? Many have woe and sorrow, and cannot help it; but drunkards wilfully create woe and sorrow to themselves. They that have contentions have woe and sorrow; and drunkards are the fools whose lips enter into contention. When the wine is in, the wit is out, and the passions up; and thence come drunken scuffles, and drunken frays, and drunken disputes over the cups; many a vexatious, ruining, law-suit has begun thus. There is babbling, quarrels in word, and the exchanging of scurrilous language; yet it rests not there; you shall have wounds without cause, for causes are things which drunkards are in no capacity to judge of, and therefore they deal blows about with the least consideration why or wherefore, and must expect to be in like manner treated themselves. The wounds which men receive in defence of their country, and its just rights, are their honour; but wounds without cause, received in service of their lusts, are marks of their infamy. Nay, drunkards wound themselves in a tender part, for they have redness of eyes, symptoms of an inward inflammation; their sight is weakened by it, and their looks deformed. This comes, (1.) Of drinking long, tarrying long at the wine, and spending that time in drunken company which should be spent in useful business, or, in sleep, which should fit for business, v. 30. Oh the precious hours which thousands throw away thus; every one of which will be brought into the account at the great day! (2.) Of drinking that which is strong and intoxicating. They go up and down to seek wine that will please them; their great inquiry, "Where is the best liquor?" They seek mixed wine, which is most palatable, but most heady; so willingly do they sacrifice their reason to please their palate!

2. It makes men impure and insolent, v. 33. (1.) The eyes grow unruly, and behold strange women to lust after them, and so let in adultery into the heart. Est Venus in vinis—Wine is oil to the fire of lust. Thine eyes shall behold strange things; so some read it. When men are drunk, the house turns round with them, and every thing looks strangely to them, so that then they cannot trust their own eyes. (2.) The tongue also grows unruly, and talks extravagantly; by it the heart utters perverse things, things contrary to reason, religion, and common civility; which they would be ashamed to speak if they were sober. What ridiculous incoherent nonsense will men talk when they are drunk, who at another time will speak admirably well, and to the purpose!

3. It stupifies and besots men, v. 34. When men are drunk, they know not where they are, nor what they say and do. (1.) Their heads are giddy, and, when they lie down to sleep, they are as if they were tossed by the rolling waves of the sea, or upon the top of a mast; hence they complain that their heads swim; their sleeps are commonly unquiet and not refreshing, and their dreams tumultuous. (2.) Their judgments are clouded, and they have no more steadiness and consistency than he that sleeps upon the top of a mast; they drink, and forget the law, (ch. 31. 5.) they err through wine, (Isa. 28. 7.) and think as extravagantly as they talk. (3.) They are heedless and fearless of danger, and senseless of the rebukes they are under, either from God or man. They are in imminent danger of death, of damnation, lie as much exposed as if they slept upon the top of a mast, and yet are secure, and sleep on. They fear no peril when the terrors of the Lord are laid before them; nay, they feel no pain when the judgments of God are actually upon them; they cry not when he binds them. Set a drunkard in the stocks, and he is not sensible of the punishment; "They have stricken me, and I was not sick; I felt it not, it made no impression at all upon me." Drunkenness turns men into stocks and stones, they are scarcely to be reckoned animals, they are dead while they live.

4. Worst of all, the heart is hardened in the sin, and the sinner, notwithstanding all these present mischiefs that attend it, obstinately persists in it, and hates to be reformed; When shall I awake? Much ado he has to shake off the chains of his drunken sleep, he can hardly get clear of the fumes of the wine, though he strive with them, that (being thirsty in the morning) he may return to again. So perfectly lost is he to all sense of virtue and honour, and so wretchedly is his conscience seared, that he is not ashamed to say, I will seek it yet again. There is no hope; no, they have loved drunkards, and after them they will go, Jer. 2. 25. This is adding drunkenness to thirst, and following strong drink; those that do so may read their doom, (Dent. 29. 19, 20.) their woe; (Isa. 5. 11.) and if this be the end of the sin, with good reason were we bid to stop at the beginning of it; Look not upon the wine when it is red.

CHAP. XXIV.

1. BE not thou envious against evil men, neither desire to be with them: 2. For their heart studieth destruction, and their lips talk of mischief.

Here, 1. The caution given is much the same with that which we had before; (ch. 23. 17.) not to envy sinners, not to think them happy, nor to wish ourselves in their condition, though they prosper ever so much in this world, and are ever so merry, and ever so secure; "Let not such a thought ever come into thy mind; Oh that I could shake off the restraints of religion and conscience, and take as great a liberty to indulge the sensual appetite, as I see such and such do! No; desire not to be with them, to do as they do, and fare as they fare, and to cast in thy lot among them."

2. Here is another reason given for this caution; Be not envious against them; not only because their end will be bad, but because their way is so, v. 2. Do not think with them, for their heart studies destruction to others, but it will prove destruction to themselves. Do not speak like them, for their lips talk of their mischief. All they say has an ill tendency; to dishonour God, reproach religion, or wrong their neighbour; but it will be mischief to themselves at last. It is therefore thy wisdom to have nothing to do with them; nor hast thou any reason to look upon them with envy, but with pity rather, or a just indignation at their wicked practices."

3. Through wisdom is an house builded, and by understanding it is established: 4. And by knowledge shall the chambers be filled with all precious and pleasant riches. 5. A wise man is strong; yea, a man of knowledge increaseth strength. 6. For by wise counsel thou shalt make thy war: and in multitude of counsellors there is safety.

We are tempted to envy those that grow rich, and raise their estates and families, by such unjust courses as our consciences will by no means suffer us to use. But, to set aside that temptation, Solomon here shews that a man, with prudent management, may raise his estate and family by lawful and honest means, with a good conscience, and a good name, and the blessing of God upon it; and if the other be raised a little sooner, yet these will last a great deal longer.

1. That which is here recommended to us, as having the best influence upon our outward prosperity, is, wisdom, and understanding, and knowledge; that is, both piety toward God, (for that is true wisdom,) and prudence in the management of our outward affairs. We must govern ourselves in every thing by the rules of religion first, and then of discretion. Some, that are truly pious, do not thrive in the world, for want of prudence; and some, that are prudent enough, yet do not prosper, because they lean to their own understanding, and do not acknowledge God in their ways; therefore both must go together to complete a wise man.

2. That which is here set before us as the advantage of true wisdom, is, that it will make men's outward affairs prosperous and successful.

(1.) It will build a house, and establish it, v. 3. Men may, by unrighteous practices, build their houses, but they cannot establish them, for the foundation is rotten; (Hab. 2. 9, 10.) whereas, what is honestly got will wear like steel, and be an inheritance to children's children.

(2.) It will enrich a house, and furnish it, v. 4. Those that manage their affairs with wisdom and equity, that are diligent in the use of lawful means for increasing what they have, that spare from luxury, and spend in charity, they are in a fair way to have their shops, their warehouses, their chambers, filled with all precious and pleasant riches; precious, because got by honest labour, and the substance of a diligent man is precious; pleasant, because enjoyed with holy cheerfulness; some think this is to be understood chiefly of spiritual riches; By knowledge the chambers of the soul are filled with the graces and comforts of the Spirit, those precious and pleasant riches; for the Spirit, by enlightening the understanding, performs all his other operations on the soul.

(3.) It will fortify a house, and turn it into a castle; Wisdom is better than weapons of war, offensive or defensive. A wise man is in strength, is in a strong-hold, yea, a man of knowledge strengthens might, increases it, v. 5. As we grow in knowledge, we grow in all grace, 2 Pet. 3. 18. Those that increase in wisdom are strengthened with all might, Col. 1. 9, 11. A wise man will compass that by his wisdom, which a strong man cannot effect by force of arms. The spirit is strengthened both for the spiritual work, and the spiritual warfare, by true wisdom.

(4.) It will govern a house and a kingdom too, and the affairs of both, v. 6. Wisdom will erect a college, or council of state. Wisdom will be of use, [1.] For the managing of the public quarrels, so as not to engage in them but for an honest cause, and with some probability of success; and engaged in, to manage them well, and so as to make either an advantageous peace, or an honourable retreat; By wise counsel thou shalt make war; which is a thing that may prove of ill consequence if not done by wise counsel. [2.] For the securing of the public peace; In the multitude of counsellors there is safety, for one may foresee the danger, and discern the advantages, which another cannot. In our spiritual conflicts, we need wisdom, for our enemy is subtle.

7. Wisdom is too high for a fool: he openeth not his mouth in the gate. 8. He that deviseth to do evil shall be called a mischievous person. 9. The thought of foolishness is sin: and the scorner is an abomination to men.

Here is the description,

1. Of a weak man; Wisdom is too high for him; he thinks it so, and therefore, despairing to attain it, he will take no pains in the pursuit of it, but sit down content without it. And really it is so, he has not capacity for it, and therefore the advantages he has for getting it are all in vain to him. It is no easy thing to get wisdom; those that have natural parts good enough, yet if they be foolish, if they be slothful and will not take pains, if they be playful and trifling, and given to their pleasures, if they be viciously inclined, and keep bad company, it is too high for them, they are not likely to reach it. And, for want of it, they are unfit for the service of their country, they open not their mouth in the gate, they are not admitted into the council or magistracy, or, if they are, they are dumb statues, and stand for cyphers, they say nothing, because they have nothing to say, and they know, that if they should offer any thing, it would not be heeded, nay, it would be hissed at. Let young men take pains to get wisdom, that they may be qualified for public business, and do it with reputation.

2. Of a wicked man, who is not only despised as a fool is, but detested. Two sorts of wicked men are so.

(1.) Such as are secretly malicious. Though they speak fair, and carry it plausibly, they devise to do evil, are contriving to do an ill turn to those they bear a grudge to, or have an envious eye at; He that does so, shall be called a mischievous person, or a master of mischief; which, perhaps, was then a common name of reproach; he shall be branded as an inventor of evil things, (Rom. 1. 30.) or, if any mischief be done, he shall be suspected as the author of it, or, at least, accessory to it. This devising evil, is the thought of foolishness, v. 9. It is made light of, and turned off with a jest, as only a foolish thing, but really it is sin, it is exceeding sinful; you cannot call it by a worse name than to call it sin. It is bad to do evil, but it is worse to devise it; for that has in it the subtlety and poison of the old serpent. But it may be taken more generally; We contract guilt, not only by the act of foolishness, but by the thought of it, though it go no further; the first risings of sin in the heart are sin, offensive to God, and must be repented of, or we are undone. Not only malicious, unclean, proud, thoughts, but even foolish thoughts, are sinful thoughts. If vain thoughts lodge in the heart, they defile it, (Jer. 4. 14.) which is a reason why we should keep our hearts with all diligence, and harbour no thoughts there which cannot give a good account of themselves, Gen. 6. 5.

(2.) Such as are openly abusive; The scorner, who gives ill-language to every body, takes a pleasure in affronting people, and reflecting upon them, he is an abomination to men; none that have any sense of honour and virtue will care to keep company with him. The seat of the scornful is the pestilential chair, (as the Seventy call it, Ps. 1. 1.) which no wise man will come near, for fear of taking the infection. Those that strive to make others odious, do but make themselves so.

10. If thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength is small.

Note, 1. In the day of adversity, we are apt to faint, to droop and be discouraged, to desist from our work, and to despair of relief. Our spirits sink, and then our hands hang down, and our knees grow feeble, and we become unfit for any thing. And often those that are most cheerful, when they are well, droop most, and are most dejected, when any thing ails them.

2. This is an evidence that our strength is small, and is a means of weakening it more; "It is a sign that thou art not a man of any resolution, any firmness of thought, any consideration, any faith, (for that is the strength of a soul,) if thou canst not bear up under an afflictive change of thy condition." Some are so feeble, that they can bear nothing; if a trouble does but touch them, (Job, 4. 5.) nay, if it does but threaten them, they faint immediately, and are ready to give up all for gone; and by this means they render themselves unfit to grapple with their trouble, and unable to help themselves. Be of good courage therefore, and God shall strengthen thy heart.

11. If thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain; 12. If thou sayest, Behold, we knew it not; doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it? and he that keepeth thy soul, doth not he know it? and shall not he render to every man according to his works?

Here is, 1. A great duty required of us, and that is, to appear for the relief of oppressed innocency; if we see the lives or livelihoods of any in danger of being taken away unjustly, we ought to bestir ourselves all we can to save them, by disproving the false accusations on which they are condemned, and seeking out proofs of their innocency. Though the persons be not such as we are under any particular obligation to, we must help them, out of a general zeal for justice. If any be set upon by force and violence, and it be in our power to rescue them, we ought to do it. Nay, if we see any through ignorance exposing themselves to danger, or fallen in distress, as travellers upon the road, ships at sea, or any the like, it is our duty, though it be with peril to ourselves, to hasten with help to them, and not forbear to deliver them, not be slack, or remiss, or indifferent, in such a case.

2. An answer to the excuse that is commonly made for the omission of this duty. Thou wilt say, "Behold, we knew it not; we were not aware of the imminency of the danger the person was in; we could not be sure that he was innocent, nor did we know how to prove it, nor which way to do any thing in favour of him, else we would have helped him." Now, (1.) It is easy to make such an excuse as this, sufficient to avoid the censures of men, for perhaps they cannot disprove us, when we say, We knew it not; or, We forgot. The temptation to tell a lie, for the excusing of a fault, is very strong, when we know that it is impossible to be disproved, the truth lying wholly in our own breast; as when we say, We thought so and so, and really designed it; which no one is conscious of but ourselves. (2.) It is not so easy with such excuses to evade the judgment of God; and to the discovery of that we lie open, and by the determination of that we must abide. Now, [1.] God pondereth the heart, and keeps the soul; he keeps an eye upon it, observes all the motions of it; its most secret thoughts and intents are all naked and open before him. It is his prerogative, and that in which he glories; (Jer. 17. 10.) I the Lord search the heart. He keeps the soul; holds it in life. This is a good reason why we should be tender of the lives of others, and do all we can to preserve them, because our lives have been precious in the sight of God, and he has graciously kept them. [2.] He knows and considers whether the excuse we make be true or no; whether it was because we did not know it, or whether the true reason was not because we did not love our neighbour as we ought, but were selfish, and regardless both of God and man. Let this serve to silence all our frivolous pleas, by which we think to stop the mouth of conscience when it charges us with the omission of plain duty. Does not he that ponders the heart consider it? [3.] He will judge us accordingly. As his knowledge cannot be imposed upon, so his justice cannot be biassed, but he will render to every man according to his works, not only the commission of evil works, but the omission of good works.

13. My son, eat thou honey, because it is good; and the honey-comb, which is sweet to thy taste: 14. So shall the knowledge of wisdom be unto thy soul: when thou hast found it, then there shall be a reward, and thy expectation shall not be cut off.

We are here quickened to the study of wisdom by the consideration both of the pleasure and the profit of it.

1. It will be very pleasant; we eat honey because it is sweet to the taste, and upon that account we call it good, especially that which runs first from the honey-comb. Canaan was said to flow with milk and honey, and it was the common food of the country, (Luke, 24. 41, 42.) even for children, Isa. 7. 15. Thus should we feed upon wisdom, and relish the good instructions of it. They that have tasted honey, need no further proof that it is sweet, nor can they by any argument be convinced of the contrary; so those that have experienced the power of truth and godliness are abundantly satisfied with the pleasure of both; they have tasted the sweetness of them, and all the atheists in the world with their sophistry, and the profane with their banter, cannot alter their sentiments.

2. It will be very profitable. Honey may be sweet to the taste, and yet not wholesome, but wisdom has a future recompence attending it, as well as a present sweetness in it; "Thou art permitted to eat honey, and the agreeableness of it to thy taste invites thee to it; but thou hast much more reason to relish and digest the precepts of wisdom; for, when thou hast found that there shall be a reward, thou shalt be paid for thy pleasure, while the servants of sin pay dear for their pains. Wisdom does indeed set thee to work, but there shall be a reward; it does indeed raise great expectations in thee, but as thy labour, so thy hope, shall not be in vain, thine expectation shall not be cut off, (ch. 23. 18.) nay, it shall be infinitely outdone."

15. Lay not wait, O wicked man, against the dwelling of the righteous; spoil not his resting-place: 16. For a just man falleth seven times, and riseth up again: but the wicked shall fall into mischief.

This is spoken, not so much by way of counsel to wicked men, they will not receive instruction, (ch. 23. 9.) but rather in defiance of them, for the encouragement of good people that are threatened by them. See here,

1. The designs of the wicked against the righteous, and the success they promise themselves in those designs. The plot is laid deep; they lay wait against the dwelling of the righteous, thinking to charge some iniquity upon it, or compass some design against it; they lie in wait at the door, to catch him when he stirs out, as David's persecutors, Ps. 59. title. The hope is raised high; they doubt not but to spoil his dwelling-place, because he is weak, and cannot support it, because his condition is low and distressed, and he is almost down already. All this is a fruit of the old enmity in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman. The blood-thirsty hate the upright.

2. The folly and frustration of those designs.

(1.) The righteous man, whose ruin was expected, recovers himself; he falls seven times into trouble, but, by the blessing of God upon his wisdom and integrity, he rises up again, sees through his troubles, and sees better times after them. The just man falls, sometimes falls seven times, perhaps into sin, sins of infirmity, through the surprise of temptation; but he rises up again, by repentance finds mercy with God, and regains his peace.

(2.) The wicked man, who expected to see his ruin, and to help it forward, is undone; he falls into mischief, his sins and his troubles are his utter destruction.

17. Rejoice not when thine enemy falleth, and let not thine heart be glad when he stumbleth: 18. Lest the LORD see it, and it displease him, and he turn away his wrath from him.

Here, 1. The pleasure we are apt to take in the troubles of an enemy is forbidden us; as when any have done us an ill turn, or we bear them ill will only because they stand in our light, or in our way; when any damage comes to them, suppose they fall; or any danger, suppose they stumble; and our corrupt hearts conceive a secret delight and satisfaction in it; Aha, so would we have it; they are entangled, the wilderness has shut them in. Or, as Tyrus said concerning Jerusalem, (Ezek. 26. 2.) I shall be replenished, now she is laid waste. "Men hope in the ruin of their enemies or rivals to wreak their revenge, or to find their account; but be not thou so inhuman; rejoice not when the worst enemy thou hast, falls." There may be a holy joy in the destruction of God's enemies, as it tends to the glory of God, and the welfare of the church; (Ps. 58. 10.) but in the ruin of our enemies, as such, we must by no means rejoice; on the contrary, we must weep, even with them when they weep, (as David, Ps. 35. 13, 14.) and that in sincerity; not so much as letting our hearts be secretly glad at their calamities.

2. The provocation which that pleasure gives to God is assigned as the reason of that prohibition; The Lord will see it, though it be hid in the heart only, and it will displease him; as it will displease a prudent father to see one child triumph in the correction of another, which he ought to tremble at and take warning by, not knowing how soon it may be his own case, he having so often deserved it. He adds an argument ad hominem—addressed to the individual, "Thou canst not do a greater kindness to thine enemy, when he is fallen, than to rejoice in it; for then, to cross thee and vex thee, God will turn his wrath from him; for, as the wrath of man works not the righteousness of God, so the righteousness of God was never intended to gratify the wrath of man, and humour his foolish passions; rather than seem to do that, he will adjourn the executions of his wrath: nay, it is implied, that when he turns his wrath from him, he will turn it against thee, and the cup of trembling shall be put into thy hand."

19. Fret not thyself because of evil men, neither be thou envious at the wicked: 20. For there shall be no reward to the evil man; the candle of the wicked shall be put out.

Here, 1. He repeats the caution he had before given against envying the pleasures and successes of wicked men in their wicked ways. "His he quotes from his father David, Ps. 37. 1. We must not in any case fret ourselves, or make ourselves uneasy, whatever God does in his providence; how disagreeable soever it to our sentiments, interests, and expectations, we must acquiesce in it. Even that which grieves us must not fret us; nor must our eye be evil against any, because God is good. Are we more wise or just than he? If wicked people prosper, we must not therefore incline to do as they do.

2. He gives a reason for this caution, taken from the end of that way which wicked men walk in; envy not their prosperity: for (1.) There is no true happiness in it; There shall be no reward to the evil man; his prosperity only serves for his present subsistence; these are all the good things he must even expect; there is none intended him in the world of retribution; he has his reward, Matth. 6. 2. He shall have none. Those are not to be envied that have their portion in this life, and must out-live it, Ps. 17. 14. (2.) There is no continuance in it; their candle shines bright, but it shall presently be put out, and a final period put to all their comforts, Job, 21. 17. Ps. 37. 1, 2.

21. My son, fear thou the LORD, and the king: and meddle not with them that are given to change: 22. For their calamity shall rise suddenly; and who knoweth the ruin of them both?

Note, 1. Religion and loyalty must go together. As men, it is our duty to honour our Creator, to worship and reverence him, and to be always in his fear; as members of a community, incorporated for mutual benefit, it is our duty to be faithful and dutiful to the government God has set over us, Rom. 13. 1, 2. Those that are truly religious will be loyal in conscience toward God; the godly in the land will be the quiet in the land; and those are not truly loyal, or will be so no longer than is for their interest, that are not religious. How should he be true to his prince, that is false to his God? And if they come in competition, it is an adjudged case; we must obey God rather than men.

2. Innovations in both are to be dreaded. Have nothing to do, he does not say, with them that change, for there may be cause to change for the better, but that are given to change, that affect it for change-sake, out of a peevish discontent with that which is, and a fondness for novelty, or a desire to fish in troubled waters; Meddle not with them that are given to change, either in religion, or in the civil government; came not into their secret, join not with them in their cabals, nor enter into the mystery of their iniquity.

3. Those that are of restless, factious, turbulent, spirits, commonly pull mischief upon their own heads ere they are aware; Their calamity shall rise suddenly. Though they carry on their designs with the utmost secrecy, they will be discovered, and brought to condign punishment, when they little think of it. Who knows the time and manner of the ruin which both God and the king will bring on their contemners, both on them and them that meddle with them?

23. These things also belong to the wise. It is not good to have respect of persons in judgment. 24. He that saith unto the wicked, Thou art righteous; him shall the people curse, nations shall abhor him: 25. But to them that rebuke him shall be delight, and a good blessing shall come upon them. 26. Every man shall kiss his lips that giveth a right answer.

Here are lessons for wise men, judges, and princes. As subjects must do their duty, and be obedient to magistrates, so magistrates must do their duty in administering justice to their subjects, both in pleas of the crown, and causes between party and party. These are lessons for them.

1. They must always weigh the merits of a cause, and not be swayed by any regard, one way or other, to the parties concerned; It is not good in itself, nor can it ever do well, to have respect of persons in judgment; the consequences of it cannot but be the perverting of justice, and doing wrong, under colour of law and equity. A good judge will know the truth, not know faces, so as to countenance a friend, and help him out in a bad cause, or so much as omit any thing that can be said or done in favour of a righteous cause, when it is the cause of an enemy.

2. They must never connive at, or encourage, wicked people in their wicked practices. Magistrates in their places, and ministers in theirs, are to deal faithfully with the wicked man, though he be a great man, or a particular friend; to convict him of his wickedness, to shew him what will be in the end thereof, to discover him to others, that they may avoid him. But if those whose office it is thus to shew people their transgressions, palliate them, and connive at them; if they excuse the wicked man, much more if they prefer him and associate with him, which is, in effect, to say, Thou art righteous, they shall justly be looked upon as enemies to the public peace and welfare, which they ought to advance, and the people shall curse them, and cry out shame on them; and even those of other nations shall abhor them, as base betrayers of their trust.

3. They must discountenance, and give check to, all fraud, violence, injustice, and immorality; and though thereby they may disoblige a particular person, yet they will recommend themselves to the favour of God and man. Let magistrates and ministers, and private persons too, that are capable of doing it, rebuke the wicked, that they may bring them to repentance, or put them to shame, and they shall have the comfort of it in their own bosoms: to them shall be delight, when their consciences witness for them that they have been witnesses for God; and a good blessing shall come upon them, the blessing of God and good men; they shall be deemed religious patrons, and their country's patriots. See ch. 28. 23.

4. They must always give judgment according to equity; (v. 26.) they must give a right answer, give their opinion, and pass sentence, according to law and the true merits of the cause; and every one shall kiss his lips that doeth so, shall love and honour him, and be subject to his orders, for there is a kiss of allegiance as well as of affection. He that in common conversation likewise speaks pertinently and with sincerity, recommends himself to his company, and is beloved and respected by all.

27. Prepare thy work without, and make it fit for thyself in the field; and afterwards build thine house.

This is a rule of prudence in the management of household affairs; for all good men should be good husbands, and manage with discretion, which would prevent a great deal of sin, and trouble, and disgrace to their profession.

1. We must prefer necessities before conveniencies and not lay that out for shew, which should be expended for the support of the family. We must be content with a mean cottage for a habitation, rather than want, or go in debt for, food convenient.

2. We must not think of building till we can afford it; "First apply thyself to thy work without in the field, let thy ground be put into good order, look after thy husbandry, for that is it by which thou must get; and when thou hast got well by that, then, and not till then, thou mayest think of re-building and beautifying thy house, for that is it upon which, and in which, thou wilt have occasion to spend." Many have ruined their estates and families by laying out money on that which brings nothing in, beginning to build, when they were not able to finish. Some understand it as advice to young men not to marry (for by that the house is built) till they have set up in the world, and got wherewith to maintain a wife and children comfortably.

3. When we have any great design on foot, it is wisdom to take it before us, and make the necessary preparations, before we fall to work, that, when it is begun, it may not stand still for want of materials. Solomon observed this rule himself in building the house of God; all was made ready before it was brought to the ground, 1 Kings, 6. 7.

28. Be not a witness against thy neighbour without cause; and deceive not with thy lips.

29. Say not I will do so to him as he hath done to me: I will render to the man according to his work.

We are here forbidden to be in any thing injurious to our neighbour, particularly in and by the forms of law; either, 1. As a witness; "Never bear a testimony against any man without cause, unless what thou sayest thou knowest to be punctually true, and thou hast a clear call to testify it. Never bear a false testimony against any one;" for it follows, "Deceive not with thy lips; deceive not thy judge and jury, deceive not those whom thou conversest with into an ill opinion of thy neighbour. When thou speakest of thy neighbour, do not only speak that which is true, but take heed, lest in the manner of thy speaking thou insinuate any thing that is otherwise, and so should deceive by innuendos or hyperboles."

Or, 2. As a plaintiff or prosecutor. If there be occasion to bring an action or information against thy neighbour, let it not be from a spirit of-revenge; Say not, I am resolved I will meet with him, I will do so to him as he has done to me; even a righteous cause becomes unrighteous, when it is thus prosecuted with malice. Say not, I will render to the man according to his work, and make him pay dear for it; for it is God's prerogative to do so, and we must leave it to him, and not step into his throne or take his work out of his hands. If we will needs be our own carvers, and judges in our own cause, we forfeit the benefit of an appeal to God's tribunal; therefore we must not avenge ourselves, because he has said, Vengeance is mine.

30. I went by the field of the slothful, and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding; 31. And, lo, it was all grown over with thorns, and nettles had covered the face thereof, and the stone-wall thereof was broken down. 32. Then I saw, and considered it well: I looked upon it, and received instruction. 33. Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep: 34. So shall thy poverty come as one that travelleth; and thy want as an armed man.

Here is, 1. The view which Solomon took of the field and vineyard of the slothful man. He did not go on purpose to see it, but, as he passed by, observing the fruitfulness of the ground, as it is very proper for travellers to do, and his subjects' management of their land, as it is very proper for magistrates to do, he cast his eye upon a field, and a vineyard, unlike all the rest; for though the soil was good, yet there was nothing growing in them but thorns and nettles; not here and there one, but they were all over-run with weeds; and if there had been any fruit, it would have been eaten up by the beasts, for there was no fence, the stone-wall was broken down. See the effects of that curse upon the ground, (Gen. 3. 18.) "Thorns and thistles shall it bring forth unto thee, and nothing else, unless thou take pains with it." See what a blessing to the world the husbandman's calling is, and what a wilderness this earth, even Canaan itself, would be without it. The king himself is served of the field, but he would be ill served, if God did not teach the husbandman discretion and diligence to rid the ground, plant it, sow it, and fence it. See what a great difference there is between some and others in the management even of their worldly affairs, and how little some consult their reputation, not caring though they proclaim their slothfulness, in the manifest effects of it, to all that pass by, shamed by their neighbour's diligence.

2. The reflections which he made upon it. He paused a little, and considered it, looked again upon it, and received instruction. He did not break out into any passionate censures of the owner, did not call him any ill names, but he endeavoured himself to get good by the observation, and to be quickened by it to diligence. Note, Those that are to give instruction to others, must receive instruction tion themselves; and instruction may be received, not only from what we read and hear, but from what we see; not only from what we see of the works of God, but from what we see of the manners of men; not only from men's good manners, but from their evil manners. Plutarch relates a saying of Cato Major, That wise men profit more by fools than fools by wise men; for wise men will avoid the faults of fools, but fools will not imitate the virtues of wise men. Solomon reckoned that he received instruction by this sight, though it did not suggest to him any new notion or lesson, but only put him in mind of an observation he himself had formerly made, of the ridiculous folly of the sluggard, who, when he has needful work to do, lies dozing in bed, and cries, Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, and still it will be a little more, till he has slept his eyes out, and, instead of being fitted by sleep for business, as wise men are, he is dulled, and stupified, and made good for nothing. Hence, certain misery attends him; his poverty comes as one that travels, it is constantly coming nearer and nearer to him, and will be upon him speedily, and want seizes him as irresistibly as an armed man, a highway-man that will strip him of all he has.

Now this is applicable, not only to our worldly business, to shew what a scandalous thing slothfulness in that is, and how injurious to the family, but to the affairs of our souls. Note, (1.) Our souls are our fields and vineyards, which we are every one of us to take care of, to dress, and to keep. They are capable of being improved with good husbandry; that may be got out of them which will be fruit abounding to our account. We are charged with them, to occupy them till our Lord come; and a great deal of care and pains it is requisite that we should take about them. (2.) These fields and vineyards are often in a very bad state; not only no fruit brought forth, but all over-grown with thorns and nettles, scratching, stinging, inordinate, lusts and passions, pride, covetousness, sensuality, malice, those are the thorns and nettles, the wild grapes, which the unsanctified heart produces; no guard kept against the enemy, but the stone-wall broken down; all lies in common, all exposed. (3.) Where it is thus, it is owing to the sinner's own slothfulness and folly; he is a sluggard, loves sleep, hates labour, and he is void of understanding, understands neither his business nor his interest: he is perfectly besotted. (4.) The issue of it will certainly be the ruin of the soul, and all its welfare. It is everlasting want that thus comes upon it as an armed man. We know the place assigned to the wicked and slothful servant.

CHAP. XXV.

1. THESE are also proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out.

This verse is the title of this latter collection of Solomon's proverbs, for he sought out, and set in order, many proverbs, that by them he might be still teaching the people knowledge, Eccl. 12. 9. Observe,

1. The proverbs were Solomon's, who was divinely inspired to deliver, for the use of the church, these wise and weighty sentences. We have had many, but still there are more; yet, herein also, Christ is greater than Solomon, for, if we had all upon record that Christ said and did, that was instructive, the world could not contain the books that should be written, John, 21. 25.

2. The publishers were Hezekiah's servants, who, it is likely, herein acted as his servants, being appointed by him to do this good service to the church, among other good offices that he did in the law and in the commandments, 2 Chron. 31. 21. Whether he employed the prophets in this work, as Isaiah, Hosea, or Micah, who lived in his time, or some that were trained up in the schools of the prophets, or some of the priests and Levites, to whom we find him giving a charge concerning divine things, (2 Chron. 29. 4.) or (as the Jews think) his princes and ministers of state, who were more properly called his servants, is not certain; if it was done by Eliakim, and Joah, and Shebna, it was no diminution to their character. They copied out these proverbs from the records of Solomon's reign, and published them as an appendix to the former edition of this book. It may be a piece of very good service to the church to publish other men's works that have lain hid in obscurity, perhaps a great while. Some think they culled these out of the 3000 proverbs which Solomon spake, (1 Kings, 4. 32.) leaving out those that were physical, and that pertained to natural philosophy, and preserving such only as were divine and moral; and in this collection some observe that special regard was had to those observations which concern kings and their administration.

2. It is the glory of God to conceal a thing: but the honour of kings is to search out a matter.
3. The heaven for height, and the earth for depth, and the heart of kings is unsearchable.

Here is, 1. An instance given of the honour of God; It is his glory to conceal a matter. He needs not search into any thing, for he perfectly knows every thing by a clear and certain view, and nothing can be hid from him; and yet his own way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters. There is an unfathomable depth in his counsels, Rom. 11. 33. It is but a little portion that is heard of him. Clouds and darkness are round about him. We see what he does, but we know not the reasons. Some refer it to the sins of men; it is his glory to pardon sin, which is covering it, nor remembering it, not mentioning it; his forbearance, which he exercises toward sinners, is likewise his honour, in which he seems to keep silence, and take no notice of the matter.

2. A double instance of the honour of kings.

(1.) It is God's glory that he needs not search into a matter, because he knows it without search; but it is the honour of kings, with a close application of mind, and by all the methods of inquiry, to search out the matters that are brought before them, to take pains in examining offenders, that they may discover their designs, and bring to light the hidden works of darkness; not to give judgment till they have weighed things; nor to leave it wholly to others to examine things, but to see with their own eyes.

(2.) It is God's glory that he cannot himself be found out by searching, and some of that honour is devolved upon kings, wise kings, that search out matters; their hearts are unsearchable, like the height of heaven, or the depth of the earth, which we may guess at, but cannot measure. Princes have their arcana imperii—state secrets, designs which are kept private, and reasons of state, which private persons are not competent judges of, and therefore ought not to pry into. Wise princes, when they search into a matter, have reaches which one would not think of, as Solomon, when he called for a sword to divide the living child with, designing thereby to discover the true mother.

4. Take away the dross from the silver, and there shall come forth a vessel for the finer. 5. Take away the wicked from before the king, and his throne shall be established in righteousness.

This shews that the vigorous endeavours of a prince to suppress vice, and reform the manners of his people, is the most effectual way to support his government.

Observe, 1. What the duty of magistrates is; To take away the wicked, to use their power for the terror of evil works and evil workers, not only to banish those that are vicious and profane from their presence, and forbid them the court, but so to frighten them and restrain them, that they may not spread the infection of their wickedness among their subjects. This is called taking away the dross from the silver, which is done by the force of fire. Wicked people are the dross of a nation, the scum of the country, and, as such, to be taken away. If men will not do it, God will, Ps. 119. 119. If the wicked be taken away from before the king, if he abandon them, and shew his detestation of their wicked courses, it will go far toward the disabling of them to do mischief. The reformation of the court will promote the reformation of the kingdom, Ps. 101. 3, 8.

2. What the advantage will be of their doing this duty. (1.) It will be the bettering of the subjects; they shall be made like silver refined, fit to be made vessels of honour. (2.) It will be the settling of the prince; his throne shall be established in this righteousness; for God will bless his government, the people will be pliable to it, and so it will become durable.

6. Put not forth thyself in the presence of the king, and stand not in the place of great men: 7. For better it is that it be said unto thee, Come up hither; than that thou shouldest be put lower in the presence of the prince whom thine eyes have seen.

Here we see, 1. That religion is so far from destroying good manners, that it teaches us to behave ourselves lowly and reverently towards our superiors, to keep our distance, and give place to those to whom it belongs; "Put not forth thyself rudely and carelessly in the king's presence, or in the presence of great men; do not compare with them;" (so some understand it); "do not vie with them in apparel, furniture, gardens, house-keeping, or retinue, for that is an affront to them, and will waste thine own estate."

2. That religion teaches us humility and self-denial, which is a better lesson than that of good manners; "Deny thyself the place thou art entitled to, covet not to make a fair shew, nor aim at preferment, nor thrust thyself into the company of those that are above thee; be content in a low sphere, if that is it which God has allotted to thee." The reason he gives, is, because this is really the way to advancement, as our Saviour shews in a parable that seems to be borrowed from this, Luke, 14.9. Not that we must therefore pretend modesty and humility, and make a stratagem of it, for the courting of honour, but therefore we must really be modest and humble, because God will put honour on such, and so will men too. It is better, more for a man's satisfaction and reputation, to be advanced above his pretensions and expectations, than to be thrust down below them, in the presence of the prince, whom it was a great piece of honour to be admitted to the sight of, and a great piece of presumption to look upon without leave.

8. Go not forth hastily to strive, lest thou know not what to do in the end thereof, when thy neighbour hath put thee to shame. 9. Debate thy cause with thy neighbour himself; and discover not a secret to another: 10. Lest he that heareth it put thee to shame, and thine infamy turn not away.

Here is good counsel given about going to law:

1. "Be not hasty in bringing an action, before thou hast thyself considered it, and consulted with thy friends about it; Go not forth hastily to strive, do not send for a writ in a passion, or upon the first appearance of right on thy side, but weigh the matter deliberately, because we are apt to be partial in our own cause; consider the certainty of the expences, and the uncertainty of the success, how much care and vexation it will be the occasion of, and, after all, the cause may go against thee; surely then thou shouldest not go forth hastily to strive."

2. "Bring not an action before thou hast tried to end the matter amicably; (v.9.) Debate thy cause with thy neighbour privately, and perhaps you will understand one another better, and see that there is no occasion to go to law." In public quarrels, the war that must at length end, might better have been prevented by a treaty of peace, and a great deal of blood and treasure spared. It is so in private quarrels; "Sue not thy neighbour as a heathen man and a publican, until thou hast told him his fault between thee and him alone, and he has refused to refer the matter, or to come to an accommodation. Perhaps the matter in variance is a secret, not fit to be divulged to any, much less to be brought upon the stage before the country; and therefore end it privately, that it may not be discovered." Reveal not the secret of another, so some read it. "Do not in revenge, to disgrace thine adversary, disclose that which should be kept private, and which does not at all belong to the cause."

Two reasons he gives why we should be thus cautious in going to law; (1.) "Because otherwise the cause will be in danger to go against thee, and thou wilt not know what to do, when the defendant has justified himself in what thou didst charge upon him, and made it out that thy complaint was frivolous and vexatious, and that thou hadst no just cause of action, and so put thee to shame, nonsuit thee, and force thee to pay costs; all which might have been prevented by a little consideration." (2.) "Because it will turn very much to thy reproach, if thou fall under the character of being litigious. Not only the defendant himself, (v.8.) but he that hears the cause tried, will put thee to shame, will expose thee as a man of no principle, and thine infamy will not turn away, thou wilt never retrieve thy reputation."

11. A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver. 12. As an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, so is a wise reprovcr upon an obedient ear.

Solomon here shews how much it becomes a man,

1. To speak pertinently; A word upon the wheels, that runs well, is well-circumstanced in proper time and place, instruction, advice, or comfort, given seasonably, and in apt expressions, adapted to the case of the person spoken to, and agreeing with, the character of the person speaking, is like golden balls resembling apples, or like true apples of a golden colour, (golden rannets,) or perhaps gilded, as sometimes we have gilded laurels, and those embossed in pictures of silver, or rather, brought to table in a silver network basket, or in a silver box of that which we call Philligree-work, through which the golden apples might be seen. Doubtless it was some ornament of the table then well known. As that was very pleasing to the eye, so is a word fitly spoken to the ear.

2. Especially to give a reproof with discretion, and so as to make it acceptable. If it be well given by a wise reprovcr, and well taken by an obedient ear, it is as an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, very graceful, and well-becoming both the reprovcr and the reprovcd; both will have their praise, the reprovcr for giving it so prudently, and the reprovcd for taking it so patiently, and making a good use of it. Others will commend them both, and they will have satisfaction in each other; he who gave the reproof is pleased that it had the desired effect, and he to whom it was given has reason to be thankful for it as a kindness. That is well given, we say, that is well taken; yet it does not always prove that that is well taken which is well given. It were to be wished that a wise reprovcr should always meet with an obedient ear, but often it is not so.

13. As the cold of snow in the time of harvest, so is a faithful messenger to them that send him: for he refresheth the soul of his masters.

See here, 1. What ought to be the care of a servant, the meanest that is sent on an errand, and intrusted with any business, much more the greatest, the agent and ambassador of a prince; he ought to be faithful to him that sends him, and to see to it that he do not, by mistake or with design, falsify his trust, and that he be in nothing, that lies in his power, wanting to his master's interest. Those that act as factors, by commission, ought to act as carefully as for themselves.

2. How much this will be the satisfaction of the master; it will refresh his soul, as much as ever the cold of snow (which in hot countries they preserve by art all the year round) refreshed the labourers in the harvest, that bore the burthen and heat of the day. The more important the affair was, and the more fear of its miscarrying, the more acceptable is the messenger, if he have managed it successfully and well. A faithful minister, Christ's messenger, should be thus acceptable to us; (Job, 33. 23.) however, he will be a sweet savour to God, 2 Cor. 2. 15.

14. Whoso boasteth himself of a false gift is like clouds and wind without rain.

He may be said to boast of a false gift,

1. Who pretends to have received or given that which he never had, which he never gave; makes a noise of his great accomplishments, and his good services, but it is all false; he is not what he pretends to be. Or,

2. Who promises what he will give, and what he will do, but performs nothing; who raises people's expectations of the mighty things he will do for his country, for his friends, what noble legacies he will leave, but either he has not wherewithal, or he never designs it. Such a one is like the morning-cloud, that passes away, and disappoints those who looked for rain from it to water the parched ground; (Jude, 12.) Clouds without water.

15. By long forbearing is a prince persuaded, and a soft tongue breaketh the bone.

Two things are here recommended to us, in dealing with others, as likely means to gain our point;

1. Patience, to bear a present heat without being put into a heat by it, and to wait for a fit opportunity to offer our reasons, and to give persons time to consider them. By this means even a prince may be persuaded to do a thing which he seemed very averse to, much more a common person. That which is justice and reason now will be so another time, and therefore we need not urge them with violence now, but wait for a more convenient season.

2. Mildness, to speak without passion or provocation; A soft tongue breaks the bone; it mollifies the roughest spirits, and overcomes those that are most morose; like lightning, which, they say, sometimes has broken the bone, and yet not pierced the flesh. Gideon with a soft tongue pacified the Ephraimites, and Abigail turned away David's wrath. Hard words, we say, break no bones, and therefore we should bear them patiently; but, it seems, soft words do, and therefore we should, on all occasions, give them prudently.

16. Hast thou found honey? eat so much as is sufficient for thee, lest thou be filled therewith, and vomit it.

Here, 1. We are allowed a sober and moderate use of the delights of sense; "Hast thou found honey?" It is not forbidden fruit to thee, as it was to Jonathan; thou mayest eat of it with thanksgiving to God, who, having created things grateful to our senses, has given us leave to make use of them. Eat as much as is sufficient, and no more; enough is as good as a feast."

2. We are cautioned to take heed of excess. We must use all pleasures as we do honey, with a check upon our appetite, lest we take more than does us good, and make ourselves sick with it. We are most in danger of surfeiting upon that which is most sweet, and therefore those that fare sumptuously every day have need to watch over themselves, lest their hearts be at any time overcharged. The pleasures of sense lose their sweetness by the excessive use of them, and become nauseous; as honey, which turns sour in the stomach; it is therefore our interest, as well as our duty, to use them with sobriety.

17. Withdraw thy foot from thy neighbour's house; lest he be weary of thee, and so hate thee.

Here he mentions another pleasure which we must not take too much of, that of visiting our friends; the former, for fear of surfeiting ourselves, this, for fear of surfeiting our neighbour.

1. It is a piece of civility to visit our neighbours sometimes, to shew our respect to them and concern for them, and to cultivate and improve mutual acquaintance and love, and that we may have both the satisfaction and advantage of their conversation.

2. It is wisdom, as well as good manners, not to be troublesome to our friends in our visiting of them; not to visit too often, nor stay too long, nor contrive to come at meal-time, nor make ourselves busy in the affairs of their families hereby we make ourselves cheap, mean, and burthensome. Thy neighbour, who is thus plagued and haunted with thy visits, will be weary of thee, and hate thee, and that will be the destruction of friendship, which should have been the improvement of it. Post tres sepe dies, piscis vilescit et hospes—After the third day, fish and company become distasteful. Familiarity breeds contempt. Nulli te facias nimis sodalem—Be not too intimate with any. He that spunges upon his friend loses him. How much better a Friend than is God than any other friend; for we need not withdraw our foot from his house, the throne of his grace; (ch. 8. 34.) the oftener we come to him the better, and the more welcome.

18. A man that beareth false witness against his neighbour is a maul, and a sword, and a sharp arrow.

Here, 1. The sin condemned, is, bearing false witness against our neighbour, either in judgment, or in common conversation, contrary to the law of the ninth commandment.

2. That which it is here condemned for, is, the mischievousness of it; it is in its power to ruin not only men's reputation, but their lives, estates, families, all that is dear to them; a false testimony is every thing that is dangerous, it is a maul or club to knock a man's brains out, a flail, which there is no fence against; it is a sword to wound near at hand, and a sharp arrow to wound at a distance; we have therefore need to pray, Deliver my soul, O Lord, from lying lips, Ps. 120. 2.

19. Confidence in an unfaithful man in time of trouble is like a broken tooth, and a foot out of joint.

1. The confidence of an unfaithful man (so some read it) will be like a broken tooth; his policy, his power, his interest, all that which he trusted in to support him in his wickedness, will fail him in time of trouble, Ps. 52. 7.

2. Confidence in an unfaithful man, so we read it; in a man whom we thought trusty, and therefore depended on, but who proves otherwise; it proves not only unserviceable, but painful and vexatious, like a broken tooth, or a foot out of joint, which, when we put any stress upon it, not only fails us, but makes us feel from it; especially in time of trouble, when we most expect help from it; it is like a broken reed, Isa. 36. 6. Confidence in a faithful God, in time of trouble, will not prove thus; on him we may rest, and in him dwell at ease.

20. As he that taketh away a garment in cold weather, and as vinegar upon nitre, so is he that singeth songs to an heavy heart.

1. The absurdity here censured, is, singing songs to a heavy heart. Those that are in great sorrow are to be comforted by sympathizing with them, condoling with them, and concurring in their lamentation: if we take that method, the moving of our lips may assuage their grief; (Job, 16. 5.) but we take a wrong course with them, if we think to relieve them by being merry with them, and endeavouring to make them merry; for it adds to their grief, to see their friends so little concerned for them, it puts them upon ripping up the causes of their grief, and aggravating them, and makes them harden themselves in sorrow against the assaults of mirth.

2. The absurdities this is compared to, are, taking away a garment from a man in cold weather, which makes him colder, or pouring vinegar upon nitre, which, like water upon lime, puts it into a ferment; so improper, so incongruous, is it to sing pleasant songs to one that is of a sorrowful spirit. Some read it in a contrary sense; As he that puts on a garment in cold weather warms the body, or as vinegar upon nitre dissolves it, so he that sings songs of comfort to a person in sorrow refreshes him, and dispels his grief.

21. If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: 22. For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the LORD shall reward thee.

By this it appears, that, however the scribes and Pharisees had corrupted the law, not only the commandment of loving our brethren, but even that of loving our enemies, was not only a new, but an old, commandment; an Old-Testament commandment, though our Saviour has given it us with the new enforcement of his own great example in loving us when we were enemies. Observe,

1. How we must express our love to our enemies; by the real offices of kindness, even those that are expensive to ourselves, and most acceptable to them; "If they be hungry and thirsty, instead of pleasing thyself with their distress, and contriving how to cut off supplies from them, relieve them, as Elisha did the Syrians that came to apprehend him," 2 Kings, 6. 22.

2. What encouragement we have to do so. (1.) It will be a likely means to win upon them, and bring them over to be reconciled to us; we shall mollify them as the refiner melts the metal in the crucible, not only by putting it over the fire, but by heaping coals of fire upon it. The way to turn an enemy into a friend, is, to act toward him in a friendly manner. If it do not gain him, it will aggravate his sin and punishment, and heap the burning coals of God's wrath upon his head, as rejoicing in his calamity, may be an occasion of God's turning his wrath from him, ch. 24. 17. (2.) However, we shall be no losers by our self-denial; "Whether he relent toward thee or no, the Lord shall reward thee; he shall forgive thee, who thus shewest thyself to be of a forgiving spirit; he shall provide for thee when thou art in distress, (though thou hast been evil and ungrateful,) as thou dost for thine enemy." However, it shall be recompensed in the resurrection of the just, when kindnesses done to our enemies shall be remembered, as well as those shewn to God's friends.

23. The north-wind driveth away rain: so doth an angry countenance a backbiting tongue.

Here see, 1. How we must discourage sin, and witness against it, and particularly the sin of slandering and backbiting; we must frown upon it, and, by giving it an angry countenance, endeavour to put it out of countenance. Slanders would not be so readily spoken as they are, if they were not readily heard; but good manners would silence the slanderer, if he saw that his tales displeased the company. We should shew ourselves uneasy, if we heard a dear friend, whom we value, evil-spoken of; the same dislike we should shew of evil speaking in general. If we cannot otherwise reprove, we may do it by our looks.

2. The good effect which this might, probably, have; who knows but it may silence and drive away a backbiting tongue? Sin, if it be countenanced, becomes daring, but if it receive any check, it is so conscious of its own shame, that it becomes cowardly, and this particularly; for many abuse those they speak of, only in hopes to curry favour with those they speak to.

24. It is better to dwell in a corner of the house-top, than with a brawling woman and in a wide house.

This is the same with what he had said, ch. 21. 9.

Observe, 1. How those are to be pitied that are unequally yoked, especially with such as are brawling and contentious, whether husband or wife; for it is equally true of both. It is better to be alone than to be joined to one, who, instead of being a meet-help, is a great hinderance to the comfort of life.

2. How those may sometimes be envied that live in solitude; as they want the comfort of society, so they are free from the vexation of it. And as there are cases which give occasion to say, "Blessed is the womb that has not borne," so there are which give occasion to say, "Blessed is the man who was never married, but who lies like a servant in a corner of the house-top."

25. As cold waters to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country.

See here, 1. How natural it is to us to desire to hear good news from our friends, and concerning our affairs at a distance. It is sometimes with impatience that we expect to hear from abroad, our souls thirst after it; but we should check the inordinateness of that desire; if it be bad news, it will come too soon, if good, it will be welcome at any time.

2. How acceptable such good news will be when it does come, as refreshing as cold water to one that is thirsty. Solomon himself had much trading abroad, as well as correspondence by his ambassadors with foreign courts; and how pleasant it was to hear of the good success of his negotiations abroad, he well knew by experience. Heaven is a country afar off; how refreshing is it to hear good news from thence, both in the everlasting gospel, which signifies glad tidings, and in the witness of the Spirit with our spirit that we are God's children.

26. A righteous man falling down before the wicked is as a troubled fountain, and a corrupt spring.

It is here represented as a very lamentable thing, and a public grievance, and of ill consequence to many, like the troubling of a fountain, and the corrupting of a spring, for the righteous to fall down before the wicked; that is,

1. For the righteous to fall into sin, in the sight of the wicked, for them to do any thing unbecoming their profession, which is told in Gath, and published in the streets of Askelon, and in which the daughters of the Philistines rejoice; for them that have been in reputation for wisdom and honour, to fall from their excellency, this troubles the fountains by grieving some, and corrupts the springs by infecting others, and emboldening them to do likewise.

2. For the righteous to be oppressed, and run down, and trampled upon, by the violence or subtlety of evil men, to be displaced, and thrust into obscurity, this is the troubling of the fountains of justice, and corrupting the very springs of government, ch. 28. 12, 28.—29. 2.

3. For the righteous to be cowardly, to truckle to the wicked, to be afraid of opposing his wickedness, and basely to yield to him, this is a reflection upon religion, a discouragement to good men, and strengthens the hands of sinners in their sins, and so is like a troubled fountain, and a corrupt spring.

27. It is not good to eat much honey: so for men to search their own glory is not glory.

Two things we must be graciously dead to.

1. To the pleasures of sense, for it is not good to eat much honey, though it pleases the taste, and, if eaten with moderation, is very wholesome, yet, if eaten to excess, it becomes nauseous, creates bile, and is the occasion of many diseases: it is true of all the delights of the children of men, that they will surfeit, but never satisfy, and they are dangerous to those that allow themselves the liberal use of them.

2. To the praise of men. We must not be greedy of that, any more than of pleasure, because, for men to search their own glory, to court applause, and covet to make themselves popular, is not their glory, but their shame, every one will laugh at them for it; and the glory which is so courted, when it is got, is not glory, it is really no true honour to a man.

Some give another sense of this verse; To eat much honey is not good, but to search into glorious and excellent things is a great commendation, it is true glory; we cannot therein offend by excess. Others thus; As honey, though pleasant to the taste, if used immoderately, oppresses the stomach, so an over-curious search into things sublime and glorious, though pleasant to us, if we pry too far, will overwhelm our capacities with a greater glory and lustre than they can bear. Or thus; "You may be surfeited with eating too much honey, but the last of glory, of their glory, the glory of the blessed, is glory, it will be ever fresh, and never pall the appetite."

28. He that hath no rule over his own spirit is like a city that is broken down, and without walls.

Here is, 1. The good character of a wise and virtuous man implied; he is one that has rule over his own spirit, he maintains the government of himself, and of his own appetites and passions, and does not suffer them to rebel against reason and conscience. He has the rule of his own thoughts, his desires, his inclinations, his resentments, and keeps them all in good order.

2. The bad case of a vicious man, who has not this rule over his own spirit, who, when temptations to excess in eating or drinking are before him, has no government of himself, when he is provoked, breaks out into exorbitant passions, such a one is like a city that is broken down, and without walls; all that is good goes out, and forsakes him, all that is evil breaks in upon him, he lies exposed to all the temptations of Satan, and becomes an easy prey to that enemy; he is also liable to many troubles and vexations; it is likewise as much a reproach to him as it is to a city to have its walls ruined, Neh. 1. 3.

CHAP. XXVI.

1. A snow in summer, and as rain in harvest, so honour is not seemly for a fool.

Note, 1. It is too common a thing for honour to be given to fools, who are utterly unworthy of it, and unfit for it; bad men, who have neither wit nor grace, are sometimes preferred by princes, and applauded and cried up by the people. Folly is set in great dignity, as Solomon observed, Eccl. 10. 6.

2. It is very absurd and unbecoming when it is so. It is as incongruous as snow in summer, and as great a disorder in the commonwealth as that is in the course of nature and in the seasons of the year; nay, it is as injurious as rain in harvest, which hinders the labourers, and spoils the fruits of the earth when they are ready to be gathered. When bad men are in power, they commonly abuse their power, in discouraging virtue, and giving countenance to wickedness, for want of wisdom to discern it, and grace to detest it.

2. As the bird by wandering, as the swallow by flying, so the curse causeless shall not come.

Here is, 1. The folly of passion; it makes men scatter causeless curses; wishing ill to others, upon presumption that they are bad, and have done ill, when either they mistake the person, or misunderstand the fact, or call evil good, and good evil. Give honour to a fool, and he thunders out his anathemas against all that he is disgusted with, right or wrong. Great men, when wicked, think they have a privilege to keep those about them in awe, by cursing them, and swearing at them; which yet is an expression of the most impotent malice, and shews their weakness as much as their wickedness.

2. The safety of innocency. He that is cursed without cause, whether by furious imprecations or solemn anathemas, the curse shall do him no more harm than the bird that flies over his head, than Goliath's curses did to David, 1 Sam. 17. 43. It will fly away like the sparrow or the wild dove, which go nobody knows whither, till they return to their proper place, as the curse will at length return upon the head of him that uttered it.

3. A whip for the horse, a bridle for the ass, and a rod for the fool's back.

Here, 1. Wicked men are compared to the horse and the ass; so brutish are they, so unreasonable, so unruly, and not to be governed but by force or fear; so low has sin sunk men, so much below themselves! Man indeed is born like the wild ass's colt, but as some, by the grace of God, are changed, and become rational, so others, by custom in sin are hardened, and become more and more sottish, as the horse and the mule, Ps. 32. 9.

2. Direction is given to use them accordingly; Princes, instead of giving honour to a fool, (v. 1.) must put disgrace upon him; instead of putting power into his hand, must exercise power over him. A horse unbroken needs a whip for correction, and an ass a bridle for direction, and to check him when he would turn out of the way; so a vicious man, who will not be under the guidance and restraint of religion and reason, ought to be whipt and bridled, to be rebuked severely, and made to smart for what he has done amiss, and to be restrained from offending any more.

4. Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest thou also be like unto him. 5. Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit.

See here the noble security of the scripture-style, which seems to contradict itself, but really does not. Wise men have need to be directed how to deal with fools; and they have never more need of wisdom than in dealing with such, to know when to keep silence, and when to speak, for there may be a time for both.

1. In some cases, a wise man will not set his wit to that of a fool, so far as to answer him according to his folly. "If he boast of himself, do not answer him by boasting of thyself. If he rail and talk passionately, do not thou rail and talk passionately too. If he tell one great lie, do not thou tell another to match it. If he calumniate thy friends, do not thou calumniate his. If he banter, do not answer him in his own language, lest thou be like him; even thou, who knowest better things, who hast more sense, and hast been better taught."

2. Yet, in other cases, a wise man will use his wisdom for the conviction of a fool; when, by taking notice of what he says, there may be hopes of doing good, or, at least, preventing further mischief, either to himself or others. "If thou have reason to think that thy silence will be deemed an evidence of the weakness of thy cause, or of thine own weakness, in such a case, answer him, and let it be an answer ad hominem—to the man, beat him at his own weapons, and that will be an answer ad rem—to the point, or as good as one. If he offer any thing that looks like an argument, answer that, and suit thine answer to his case. If he think, because thou dost not answer him, that what he says is unanswerable, then give him an answer, lest he be wise in his own conceit, and boast of a victory." For (Luke, 7. 35.) wisdom's children must justify her.

6. He that sendeth a message by the hand of a fool cullteth off the feet, and drinketh damage. 7. The legs of the lame are not equal: so is a parable in the mouth of fools. 8. As he that bindeth a stone in a sling, so is he that giveth honour to a fool. 9. As a thorn goeth up into the hand of a drunkard, so is a parable in the mouth of fools.

To recommend wisdom to us, and to quicken us to the diligent use of all the means for the getting of wisdom, Solomon here shews that fools are fit for nothing; they are either sottish men, who will never think and design at all, or vicious men, who will never think and design well.

1. They are not fit to be intrusted with any business, not fit to go on an errand; (v. 6.) He that does but send a message by the hand of a fool, of a careless, heedless, person, one who is so full of his jests, and so given to his pleasures, that he cannot apply his mind to any thing that is serious, he will find his message misunderstood, the one half of it forgotten, the rest awkwardly delivered, and so many blunders made about it, that he had as good have cut off his legs, that is, never have sent him; nay, he will drink damage, it will be very much to his prejudice to have employed such a one, who, instead of bringing him a good account of his affairs, will abuse him, and put a trick upon him; for, in Solomon's language, a knave and a fool are of the same signification. It will turn much to a man's disgrace to make use of the service of a fool, for people will be apt to judge of the master by his messenger.

2. They are not fit to have any honour put upon them; he had said, (v. 1.) Honour is not seemly for a fool; here he shews that it is lost and thrown away upon him; as if a man should throw a precious stone, or a stone fit to be used in weighing, into a heap of common stones, where it would be buried, and of no use; it is as absurd as if a man should dress up a stone in purple, so others; nay, it is dangerous, it is like a stone bound in a sling, with which a man will be likely to do hurt; to give honour to a fool, is to put a sword in a madman's hand, with which we know not what mischief he may do, even to those that put it into his hand.

3. They are not fit to deliver wise sayings, nor should they undertake to handle any matter of weight, though they should be instructed concerning it, and be able to say something to it. Wise sayings, as a foolish man delivers them, and applies them, (in such a manner, that one may know he does not rightly understand them,) lose their excellency and usefulness; A parable in the mouth of fools ceases to be a parable, and becomes a jest. If a man who lives a wicked life, yet speaks religiously, and takes God's covenant into his mouth,

(1.) He does but shame himself and his profession; As the legs of the lame are not equal, by reason of which their going is unseemly, so unseemly is it for a fool to pretend to speak apophthegms, and give advice, and for a man to talk devoutly, whose conversation is a constant contradiction to his talk, and gives him the lie. His good words raise him up, but then his bad life takes him down, and so his legs are not equal. "A wise saying (says Bishop Patrick) doth as ill become a fool as dancing doth a cripple; for as his lameness never so much appears as when he would seem nimble, so the other's folly is never so ridiculous as when he would seem wise." As therefore it is best for a lame man to keep his seat, so it is best for a silly man, and a bad man, to hold his tongue.

(2.) He does but do mischief with it to himself and others, as a drunkard does with a thorn, or any other sharp thing which he takes in his hand, with which he tears himself and those about him, because he knows not how to manage it. Those that talk well, and do not live well, their good words will aggravate their own condemnation, and others will be hardened by their inconsistency with themselves. Some give this sense of it; The sharpest saying, by which a sinner, one would think, should be pricked to the heart, makes no more impression upon a fool, no, though it come out of his own mouth, than the scratch of a thorn does upon the hand of a man when he is drunk, who then feels it not, nor complains of it, ch. 23. 35.

10. The great God that formed all things both rewardeth the fool, and rewardeth transgressors.

Our translation gives this verse a different reading in the text, and in the margin; and accordingly it bespeaks, either,

1. The equity of a good God; The Master, or Lord, (so Rab signifies,) or, as we read it, The great God that formed all things at first, and still governs them in infinite wisdom, renders to every man according to his work. He rewards the fool, who sinned through ignorance, who knew not his Lord's will, with few stripes; and he rewards the transgressor, who sins presumptuously, and with a high hand, who knew his Lord's will, and would not do it, with many stripes. Some understand it of the goodness of God's common providence, even to fools and transgressors, on whom he causes his sun to shine, and his rain to fall. Or it bespeaks,

2. The iniquity of a bad prince; so the margin reads it; A great man grieves all; and he hires the fool, he hires also the transgressors. When a wicked man gets power in his hand, by himself, and by the fools and knaves whom he employs under him, whom he hires, and chooses to make use of, he grieves all who are under him, and is vexatious to them. We should therefore pray for kings, and all in authority, that, under them, our lives may be quiet and peaceable.

11. As a dog returneth to his vomit, so a fool returneth to his folly.

See here, 1. What an abominable thing sin is, and how hateful sometimes it is made to appear, even to the sinner himself. When his conscience is convinced, or he feels smart from his sin, he is sick of it, and vomits it up; he seems then to detest it, and to be willing to part with it. It is in itself, and, first or last, will be to the sinner, more loathsome than the vomit of a dog, Ps. 36. 2.

2. How apt sinners are to relapse into it notwithstanding; as the dog, after he has gained ease by vomiting that which burthened his stomach, yet goes and licks it up again, so sinners, who have been convinced only, and not converted, return to sin again, forgetting how sick it made them. The Apostle applies this proverb to those that have known the way of righteousness, but are turned from it; (2 Pet. 2. 22.) but God will spew them out of his mouth, Rev. 3. 16.

12. Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit? There is more hope of a fool than of him.

Here is, 1. A spiritual disease supposed, and that is self-conceit. Seest thou a man? Yes, we see many a one, wise in his own conceit; who has some little sense, but is proud of it, thinks it much more than it is, more than any of his neighbours have, and enough, so that he needs no more; has such a conceit of his own abilities as makes him opinionative, dogmatical, and censorious; and all the use he makes of his knowledge, is, that it puffs him up. Or, if by a wise man we understand a religious man, it describes the character of those who, making some show of religion, conclude their spiritual state to be good, when really it is very bad, like Laodicea, Rev. 3. 17.

2. The danger of this disease; it is in a manner desperate, there is more hope of a fool, that knows, and owns, himself to be such, than of such a one. Solomon was not only a wise man himself, but a teacher of wisdom; and this observation he made upon his pupils, that he found his work most difficult, and least successful, with those that had a good opinion of themselves, and were not sensible that they needed instruction. Therefore he that seems to himself to be wise, must become a fool, that he may be wise, 1 Cor. 3. 18. There is more hope of a publican than of a proud Pharisee, Matth. 21. 32. Many are hindered from being truly wise, and religious, by a false and groundless conceit that they are so, John. 9. 40, 41.

13. The slothful man saith, There is a lion in the way; a lion is in the streets.

When a man talks foolishly, we say, He talks idly; for none betray their folly more than those who are idle, and go about to excuse themselves in their idleness. As men's folly makes them slothful, so their slothfulness makes them foolish. Observe,

1. What the slothful man really dreads; he dreads the way, the streets, the place, where work is to be done, and a journey to be gone; he hates business, hates every thing that requires care and labour.

2. What he dreams of, and pretends to dread; a lion in the way. When he is pressed to be diligent, either in his worldly affairs, or in the business of religion, this is his excuse, (and a sorry excuse it is, as bad as none,) There is a lion in the way, some insuperable difficulty or danger which he cannot pretend to grapple with. Lions frequent woods and deserts; and, in the day-time, when man has business to do, they are in their dens, Ps. 104. 22, 23. But the sluggard fancies, or rather pretends to fancy, a lion in the streets, whereas the lion is only in his own fancy, nor is he so fierce as he is painted. Note, It is a foolish thing to frighten ourselves from real duties by fancied difficulties, Ecc. 11. 4.

14. As the door turneth upon his hinges, so doth the slothful upon his bed.

Having seen the slothful man in fear of his work, here we find him in love with his ease; he lies in his bed on one side till he is weary of that, and then turns to the other, but still in his bed, when it is far in the day, and work is to be done; as the door is moved, but not removed; and so his business is neglected, and his opportunities let slip. See the sluggard's character:

1. He is one that does not care to get out of his bed, but seems to be hung upon it, as the door upon the hinges. Bodily ease, too much consulted, is the sad occasion of many a spiritual disease. They that love sleep will prove in the end to have loved death.

2. He does not care to get forward with his business, in that he stirs to and fro a little, but to no purpose, he is where he was. Slothful professors turn, in profession, like the door upon the hinges. The world and the flesh are the two hinges on which they are hung, and, though they move in a course of external services, are got into a road of duties, and tread around in them like the horse in the mill, yet they get no good, they get no ground, they are never the nearer heaven; sinners unchanged, saints unimproved.

15. The slothful hideth his hand in his bosom; it grieveth him to bring it again to his mouth.

The sluggard is now, with much ado, got out of his bed, but he might as good have lain there still, for any thing he is likely to bring to pass in his work, so awkwardly does he go about it. Observe,

1. The pretence he makes for his slothfulness; He hides his hand in his bosom, for fear of cold; next to his warm bed is his warm bosom; or, pretending that he is lame, as some do, that make a trade of begging; something ails his hand, he would have it thought that it is blistered with yesterday's hard work; or, it speaks, in general, his aversion to business; he has tried, and his hands are not used to labour, and therefore he hugs himself in his own ease, and cares for nobody. Note, It is common for those that will not do their duty, to pretend they cannot; I cannot dig, Luke, 16. 3.

2. The prejudice he sustains by his slothfulness; He himself is the loser by it, for he starves himself; it grieves him to bring his hand to his mouth, he cannot find in his heart to feed himself, but dreads, as if it were a mighty toil, to lift his hand to his head. It is an elegant hyperbole, aggravating his sin, that he cannot endure to take the least pains, no, not for the greatest profit, and shewing how his sin is his punishment. Those that are slothful in the business of religion will not be at the pains to feed their own souls with the word of God, the bread of life, nor to fetch in promised blessings by prayer, though they might have them for the fetching.

16. The sluggard is wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason.

Observe, 1. The high opinion which the sluggard has of himself, notwithstanding the gross absurdity and folly of his slothfulness; He thinks himself wiser than seven men, than seven wise men, for they are such as can render a reason. It is the wisdom of a man to be able to render a reason; of a good man, to be able to give a reason of the hope that is in him, 1 Pet. 3. 15. What we do we should be able to render a reason for, though, perhaps, we may not have wit enough to shew the fallacy of every objection against it. He that takes pains in religion can render a good reason for it; he knows that he is working for a good Master, and that his labour shall not be in vain. But the sluggard thinks himself wiser than seven such; for, let seven such persuade him to be diligent, with all the reasons they can render for it, it is to no purpose, his own determination, he thinks, answer enough to them and all their reasons.

2. The reference that this has to his slothfulness. It is the sluggard, above all men, that is thus self-conceited; for, (1.) His good opinion of himself is the cause of his slothfulness; therefore he will not take pains to get wisdom, because he thinks he is wise enough already. A conceit of the sufficiency of our attainments is a great enemy to our improvement. (2.) His slothfulness is the cause of his good opinion of himself. If he would but take pains to examine himself, and compare himself with the laws of wisdom, he would have other thoughts of himself. Indulged slothfulness is at the bottom of prevailing self-conceitedness. Nay, (3.) So wretchedly besotted is he, that he takes his slothfulness to be his wisdom; he thinks it is his wisdom to make much of himself, and take all the ease he can get, and do no more in religion than he needs must, to avoid suffering; to sit still and see what other people do, that he may have the pleasure of finding fault with them. Of such sluggards, who are proud of that which is their shame, there is little hope, v. 12.

17. He that passeth by, and meddleth with strife belonging not to him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears.

1. That which is here condemned, is, meddling with strife that belongs not to us. If we must not be hasty to strive in our own cause, (ch. 25. 8.) much less in other people's, especially theirs that we are no way related to, or concerned in, but light on accidentally as we pass by. If we can be instrumental to make peace between those that are at variance, we must do it, though we should thereby get the ill-will of both sides, at least, while they are in their heat; but to make ourselves busy in other men's matters, and parties in other men's quarrels, is not only to court our own trouble, but to thrust ourselves into temptation. Who made me a judge? Let them end it, as they began it, between themselves.

2. Therefore we are cautioned against it, because of the danger it exposes us to; it is like taking a snarling cur by the ears, that will snap at you, and bite you; you had better have let him alone, for you cannot get clear of him when you would, and must thank yourselves if you come off with a wound and dishonour. He that has got a dog by the ears, if he let him go, he flies at him, if he keeps his hold, he has his hands full, and can do nothing else. Let every one with quietness work, and mind his own business, and not with unquietness quarrel, and meddle with other people's business.

18. As a mad man who casteth fire-brands, arrows, and death, 19. So is the man that deceiveth his neighbour, and saith, Am not I in sport?

See here, 1. How mischievous those are that make no scruple of deceiving their neighbours, they are as mad men that cast fire-brands, arrows, and death; so much hurt may they do by their deceits. They value themselves upon it, as politic, cunning, men, but really they are as mad men. There is not a greater madness in the world than a wilful sin. It is not only the passionate, furious, man, but the malicious, deceitful, man, that is a mad man; he does in effect cast fire-brands, arrows, and death; he does more mischief than he can imagine. Fraud and falsehood burn like fire-brands, kill, even at a distance, like arrows.

2. See how frivolous the excuse is which men commonly make for the mischief they do, that they did it in jest; with this they think to turn it off when they are reproved for it, Am not I in sport? But it will prove dangerous playing with fire, and jesting with edge-tools. Not that those are to be commended who are captious, and can take no jest, they that themselves are wise, must suffer fools, (2 Cor. 11. 19, 20.) but those are certainly to be condemned who are any way abusive to their neighbours, impose upon their credulity, cheat them in their bargains with them, tell lies to them, or tell lies of them, give them ill language, or sully their reputation, and then think to excuse it by saying that they did but jest; Am not I in sport? He that sins in jest, must repent in earnest, or his sin will be his ruin. Truth is too valuable a thing to be sold for a jest, and so is the reputation of our neighbour. By lying and slandering in jest, men learn themselves, and teach others, to lie and slander in earnest; a false report, raised in mirth, may be spread in malice; and if a man may tell a lie to make himself merry, why not to make himself rich? and so truth quite perishes, and men teach their tongues to tell lies, Jer. 9. 5. If men would consider that a lie comes from the Devil, and brings to hell-fire, surely that would spoil the sport of it; it is casting arrows and death to themselves.

20. Where no wood is, there the fire goeth out: so where there is no tale-bearer, the strife ceaseth.

21. As coals are to burning coals, and wood to fire; so is a contentious man to kindle strife.

22. The words of a tale-bearer are as wounds, and they go down into the innermost parts of the belly.

Contention is as a fire, it heats the spirit, burns up all that is good, and puts families and societies into a flame. Now here we are told how that fire is commonly kindled and kept burning, that we may avoid the occasions of strife, and so prevent the mischievous consequences of it. If then we would keep the peace,

1. We must not give ear to tale-bearers, for they feed the fire of contention with fuel; nay, they spread it with combustible matter; the tales they carry are fire-balls; they who, by insinuating base characters, revealing secrets, and misrepresenting words and actions, do what they can to make relations, friends, and neighbours, jealous one of another, to alienate them one from another, and sow discord among them, are to be banished out of families, and all societies, and then strife will as surely cease, as the fire will go out when it has no fuel; the contenders will better understand one another, and come to a better temper; old stories will soon be forgotten, when there are no new ones told to keep up the remembrance of them, and both sides will see how they have been imposed upon by a common enemy. Whisperers and backbiters are incendiaries not to be suffered.

To illustrate this, he repeats (v. 22.) what he had said before, (ch. 18. 8.) that the words of a tale-bearer are as wounds, deep and dangerous wounds, wounds in the vitals; they wound the reputation of him who is belied, and, perhaps, the wound proves incurable, and even the plaister of a recantation (which yet can seldom be obtained) may not prove wide enough for it; they wound the love and charity which he, to whom they are spoken, ought to have for his neighbour, and give a fatal stab to friendship and Christian fellowship. We must therefore not only not be tale-bearers ourselves at any time, nor ever do any ill offices, but we should not give the least countenance to those that are.

2. We must not associate with peevish, passionate, people, that are exceptions, and apt to put the worst constructions upon every thing, that pick quarrels upon the least occasion, and are quick, and high, and hot, in resenting affronts; these are contentious men that kindle strife, v. 21. The less we have to do with such, the better, for it will be very hard not to quarrel with those that are quarrelsome.

23. Burning lips and a wicked heart are like a potsherd covered with silver dross.

This may be meant, either,

1. Of a wicked heart shewing itself in burning lips, furious, passionate, outrageous words, burning in malice, and persecuting those to whom, or of whom, they are spoken; ill words and ill-will agree as well together as a potsherd and the dross of silver, which, now that the pot is broken and the dross separated from the silver, are fit to be thrown together to the dunghill.

2. Or of a wicked heart disguising itself with burning lips, burning with the professions of love and friendship, and even persecuting a man with flatteries; this is like a potsherd covered with the scum or dross of silver, with which one that is weak may be imposed upon, as if it were of some value, but a wise man is soon aware of the cheat. This sense agrees with the following verses.

24. He that hateth dissembleth with his lips, and layeth up deceit within him; 25. When he speaketh fair, believe him not: for there are seven abominations in his heart. 26. Whose hatred is covered by deceit, his wickedness shall be shewed before the whole congregation.

There is cause to complain, not only of the want of sincerity in men's profession of friendship, and that they do not love so well as they pretend, nor will serve their friends so much as they promise, but, which is much worse, of wicked designs in the profession of friendship, and the making of it subservient to the most malicious intentions. This is here spoken of as a common thing; (v. 24.) He that hates his neighbour, and is contriving to do him a mischief, yet dissembles with his lips, professes to have a respect for him, and to be ready to serve him, talks kindly with him, as Cain with Abel, asks, Art thou in health, my brother? as Joab to Amasa, that his malice may not be suspected, and guarded against, and so he may have the fairer opportunity to execute the purposes of it, this man lays up deceit within him, he keeps in his mind the mischief he intends to do his neighbour, till he catches him at an advantage. This is malice which has no less of the subtlety, than it has of the venom, of the old serpent in it.

Now, as to this matter, we are here cautioned,

1. Not to be so foolish as to suffer ourselves to be imposed upon by the pretensions of friendship. Remember to distrust when a man speaks fair, be not too forward to believe him, unless you know him well, for it is possible there may be seven abominations in his heart, a great many projects of mischief against you, which he is labouring so industriously to conceal with his fair speech. Satan is an enemy that hates us, and yet, in his temptations, speaks fair, as he did to Eve, but it is madness to give credit to him, for there are seven abominations in his heart, seven other spirits does one unclean spirit bring more wicked than himself.

2. Not to be so wicked as to impose upon any with a profession of friendship; for, though the fraud may be carried on plausibly a while, it will be brought to light, v. 26. He whose hatred is covered by deceit, one time or other will be discovered, and his wickedness shewed, to his shame and confusion, before the whole congregation; and nothing will do more to make a man odious to all companies. Love (says one) is the best armour, but the worst cloke, and will serve dissemblers as the disguise which Ahab put on and perished in.

27. Whoso diggeth a pit shall fall therein: and he that rolleth a stone, it will return upon him.

See here, 1. What pains men take to do mischief to others: As they put a force upon themselves by concealing it with a profession of friendship, so they put themselves to a great deal of labour to bring it about; it is digging a pit, it is rolling a stone, hard work; and yet men will not stick at it, to gratify their passion and revenge.

2. What preparation they hereby make of mischief to themselves; their violent dealing will return upon their own heads: they shall themselves fall into the pit they digged, and the stone they rolled will return upon them, Ps. 7. 15, 16.—9. 15, 16. The righteous God will take the wise, not only in their own craftiness, but in their own cruelty. It is the plotter's doom. Haman is hanged on a gallows of his own preparing:

—Nec lex est justior ulla
Quam neis artifices arte perire sua—

Nor is there any law more just than that the contrivers of destruction should perish by their own arts.

28. A lying tongue hateth those that are afflicted by it; and a flattering mouth worketh ruin.

There are two sorts of lies equally detestable.

1. A slandering lie, which avowedly hates those it is spoken of; A lying tongue hates those that are afflicted by it; it afflicts them by calumnies and reproaches, because it hates them, and can thus smite them secretly where they are without defence; and it hates them, because it has afflicted them, and made them its enemies. The mischief of this is open and obvious: it afflicts, it hates, and owns it, and every body sees it.

2. A flattering lie, which secretly works the ruin of those it is spoken to. In the former, the mischief is plain, and men guard against it as well as they can, but in this it is little suspected, and men betray themselves by being credulous of their own praises, and the compliments that are passed upon them. A wise man therefore will be more afraid of a flatterer that kisses and kills, than of a slanderer that proclaims war.

CHAP. XXVII.

1. BOAST not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth.

Here is, 1. A good caution against presuming upon time to come; Boast not thyself, no, not of to-morrow, much less of many days or years to come. This does not forbid preparing for to-morrow, but presuming upon to-morrow. We must not promise ourselves the continuance of our lives and comforts till to-morrow, but speak of it with submission to the will of God, and as those who, with good reason, are kept at uncertainty about it. We must not take thought for the morrow, (Matth. 6. 34.) but we must cast our care concerning it upon God. See James, 4. 13. 15. We must not put off the great work of conversion, that one thing needful, till to-morrow, as if we were sure of it, but to-day, while it is called to-day, hear God's voice.

2. A good consideration, upon which this caution is grounded; We know not what a day may bring forth; what event may be in the teeming womb of time; it is a secret till it is born, Eccl. 11. 5. A little time may produce considerable changes, and such as we little think of; we know not what the present day may bring forth, the evening must commend it. Nescis quid serus vesper vehat—Thou knowest not what the close of evening may bring with it. God has wisely kept us in the dark concerning future events, and reserved to himself the knowledge of them, as a flower of the crown, that he may train us up in a dependence upon himself, and a continued readiness for every event, Acts, 1. 7.

2. Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth; a stranger, and not thine own lips.

Note, 1. We must do that which is commendable, for which even strangers may praise us. Our light must shine before men, and we must do good works that may be seen, though we must not do them on purpose that they may be seen. Let our own works be such as will praise us, even in the gates, Phil. 4. 8.

2. When we have done it, we must not commend ourselves, for that is an evidence of pride, folly, and self-love, and a great lessening to a man's reputation. Every one will be forward to run him down that cries himself up. There may be a just occasion for us to vindicate ourselves, but it does not become us to applaud ourselves. Proprio laus sordet in ore—Self-praise defiles the mouth.

3. A stone is heavy, and the sand weighty; but a fool's wrath is heavier than them both. 4. Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous; but who is able to stand before envy?

These two verses shew the intolerable mischief,

1. Of ungoverned passion; The wrath of a fool, who, when he is provoked, cares not what he says and does, is more grievous than a great stone, or a load of sand. It lies heavy upon himself. Those who have no command of their passions do themselves even sink under the load of them. The wrath of a fool lies heavy upon those he is enraged at, to whom, in his fury, he will be in danger of doing some mischief. It is therefore our wisdom not to give provocation to a fool, but, if he be in a passion, to get out of his way.

2. Of rooted malice; which is as much worse than the former, as coals of juniper are than a fire of thorns; Wrath (it is true) is cruel, and does many a barbarous thing, and anger is outrageous; but a secret enmity at the person of another, an envy at his prosperity, and a desire of revenge for some injury or affront, are much more mischievous: one may avoid a sudden heat, as David escaped Saul's javelin, but when it grows, as Saul's did, to a settled envy, there is no standing before it; it will pursue, it will overtake. He that grieves at the good of another, will be still contriving to do him hurt, and will keep his anger for ever.

5. Open rebuke is better than secret love. 6. Faithful are the wounds of a friend; but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful.

Note, 1. It is good for us to be reprov'd, and told of our faults, by our friends. If true love in the heart has but zeal and courage enough to shew itself in dealing plainly with our friends, and reproving them for what they say and do amiss, this is really better, not only than secret hatred, (as Lev. 19. 17.) but than secret love, that love to our neighbours which does not shew itself in this good fruit, which compliments them in their sins, to the prejudice of their souls; Faithful are the reproofs of a friend, though, for the present, they are painful as wounds. It is a sign that our friends are faithful indeed, if, in love to our souls, they will not suffer sin upon us, nor let us alone in it. The physician's care is to cure the patient's disease, not to please his palate.

2. It is dangerous to be caressed and flattered by an enemy, whose kisses are deceitful; we can take no pleasure in them, because we can put no confidence in them. Joab's kiss and Judas's were deceitful, and therefore we have need to stand upon our guard, that we be not deluded by them; they are to be deprecated. Some read it, The Lord deliver us from an enemy's kisses; from lying lips, and from a deceitful tongue.

7. The full soul loatheth an honey-comb; but to the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet.

Solomon here, as often in this book, shews that the poor have in some respects the advantage of the rich; for,

1. They have a better relish of their enjoyments than the rich have; hunger is the best sauce. Coarse fare, with a good appetite to it, has a sensible pleasantness in it, which they are strangers to whose hearts are overcharged with surfeiting. They that fare sumptuously every day nauseate even delicate food, as the Israelites did the quails; whereas they that have no more than their necessary food, though it be such as the full soul would call bitter, to them it is sweet; they eat it with pleasure, digest it, and are refreshed by it.

2. They are more thankful for their enjoyments; The hungry will bless God for bread and water, while those that are full think the greatest dainties and varieties scarcely worth giving thanks for. The virgin Mary seems to refer to this, when she says, (Luke, 1. 53.) The hungry, who know how to value God's blessings, are filled with good things, but the rich, who despise them, are justly sent empty away.

8. As a bird that wandereth from her nest, so is a man that wandereth from his place.

Note, 1. There are many that do not know when they are well off, but are uneasy with their present condition, and given to change. God, in his providence, has appointed them a place fit for them, and has made it comfortable to them; but they affect unsettledness, they love to wander, they are glad of a pretence to go abroad, and do not care for staying long at a place; they needlessly absent themselves from their own work and care, and meddle with that which belongs not to them.

2. Those that thus desert the post assigned to them, are like a bird that wanders from her nest. It is an instance of their folly, they are like a silly bird, they are always wavering, like the wandering bird that hops from bough to bough, and rests nowhere. It is unsafe; the bird that wanders is exposed; a man's place is his castle, he that quits it makes himself an easy prey to the fowler; when the bird wanders from her nest, the eggs and young ones there are neglected. They that love to be abroad leave their work at home undone. Let every man therefore, in the calling wherein he is called, therein abide, therein abide with God.

9. Ointment and perfume rejoice the heart: so doth the sweetness of a man's friend by hearty counsel. 10. Thine own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not: neither go into thy brother's house in the day of thy calamity: for better is a neighbour that is near, than a brother far off.

Here is, 1. A charge given to be faithful and constant to our friends, our old friends, to keep up an intimacy with them, and to be ready to do them all the good offices that lie in our power. It is good to have a friend, a bosom-friend, whom we can be free with, and with whom we may communicate counsels; it is not necessary that this friend should be a relation, or any way akin to us, though it is happiest, when, among those who are so, we find one fit to make a friend of. Peter and Andrew were brethren, so were James and John; yet Solomon frequently distinguishes between a friend and a brother. But it is advisable to choose a friend among our neighbours who live near us, that acquaintance may be kept up, and kindnesses the more frequently interchanged. It is good also to have a special respect to those who have been friends to our family; "Thine own friend, especially if he have been thy father's friend, forsake not; fail not both to serve him, and to use him, as there is occasion. He is a tried friend, he knows thine affairs, he has a particular concern for thee, therefore be advised by him." It is a duty we owe to our parents, when they are gone, to love their friends, and consult with them. Solomon's son undid himself by forsaking the counsel of his father's friends.

2. A good reason given why we should thus value true friendship, and be choice of it.

(1.) Because of the pleasure of it. There is a great deal of sweetness in conversing and consulting with a cordial friend; it is like ointment and perfume, which are very grateful to the smell, and exhilarate the spirits, it rejoices the heart, the burthen of care is made lighter by unbosoming ourselves to our friend, and it is a great satisfaction to us to have his sentiments concerning our affairs. The sweetness of friendship lies not in hearty mirth, and hearty laughter, but in hearty counsel, faithful advice, sincerely given and without flattery; by counsel of the soul, so the word is; counsel which reaches the case, and comes to the heart; counsel about soul-concerns, Ps. 66. 16. We should reckon that the most pleasant conversation, which is about spiritual things, and promotes the prosperity of the soul.

(2.) Because of the profit and advantage of it, especially in a day of calamity; when we are here advised not to go into a brother's house, not to expect relief from a kinsman, merely for kindred-sake, for the obligation of that commonly goes little further than calling cousin, and fails when it comes to the trial of a real kindness; but, rather, to apply ourselves to our neighbours, who are at hand, and will be ready to help us at an exigence. It is wisdom to oblige them by being neighbourly, and we shall have the benefit of it in distress, by finding them so to us, ch. 18. 24.

11. My son, be wise, and make my heart glad, that I may answer him that reproacheth me.

Children are here exhorted to be wise and good,

1. That they may be a comfort to their parents, and may make their hearts glad, even when the evil days come, and so recompense them for their care, ch. 23. 15.

2. That they may be a credit to them; "That I may answer him that reproaches me with having been over-strict and severe in bringing up my children, and having taken a wrong method with them, in restraining them from the liberties which other young people take. My son, be wise, and then it will appear, in the effect, that I went the wisest way to work with my children." Those that have been blest with a religious education, should carry it so in every thing as to be a credit to their education, and to silence those who say, A young saint, an old Devil; and to prove the contrary, A young saint, an old Angel.

12. A prudent man foreseeth the evil, and hideth himself; but the simple pass on, and are punished.

This we had before, ch. 22. 3.

Note, 1. Evil may be foreseen. Where there is temptation, it is easy to foresee, that, if we thrust ourselves into it, there will be sin, and as easy to foresee, that, if we venture upon the evil of sin, there will follow the evil of punishment; and, commonly, God warns before he wounds, having set watchmen over us, Jer. 6. 17.

2. It will be well or ill with us, according as we do, or do not, improve the foresight we have of evil before us; The prudent man, foreseeing the evil, forecasts accordingly, and hides himself, but the simple is either so dull that he does not foresee it, or so wilful and slothful that he will take no care to avoid it, and so he passes on securely, and is punished. We do well for ourselves, when we provide for hereafter.

13. Take his garment that is surety for a stranger, and take a pledge of him for a strange woman.

This also we had before, ch. 20. 16.

1. It shews who they are that are hastening to poverty; those that have so little consideration as to be bound for every body that will ask them, and those that are given to women. Such as these will take up money as far as ever their credit will go, but they will certainly cheat their creditors at last, nay, they are cheating them all along. An honest man may be made a beggar, but he is not honest that makes himself one.

2. It advises us to be so discreet, in ordering our affairs, as not to lend money to those who are manifestly wasting their estates, unless they give very good security for it. Foolish lending is injustice to our families. He does not say, "Get another to be bound with him," for he that makes himself a common voucher will have those to be his security who are as insolvent as himself; therefore Take his garment.

14. He that blesseth his friend with a loud voice, rising early in the morning, it shall be counted a curse to him.

Note, 1. It is a great folly to be extravagant in praising even the best of our friends and benefactors; it is our duty to give every one his due praise, to applaud those that excel in knowledge, virtue, and usefulness, and to acknowledge the kindnesses we have received with thankfulness; but to do this with a loud voice, rising early in the morning, to be always harping on this string, in all companies, even to our friend's face, or so as that he may be sure to hear it, to do it studiously, as we do that which we rise early to, to magnify the merits of our friend above measure, and with hyperboles, is fulsome, and nauseous, and savours of hypocrisy and design; praising men for what they have done, is only to get more out of them; and every body concludes the parasite will be well paid for his panegyric or epistle dedicatory. We must not give that praise to our friend, which is due to God only, as some think is intimated in rising early to do it; for in the morning God is to be praised. We must not make too much haste to praise men, so some understand it; not cry up men too soon for their abilities and performances, but let them first be proved; lest they be lifted up with pride, and laid to sleep in idleness.

2. It is a greater folly to be fond of being ourselves extravagantly praised; a wise man rather counts it a curse, and a reflection upon him; not only designed to pick his pocket, but which may really turn to his prejudice. Modest praises (as a great man observes) invite such as are present to add to the commendation, but immodest, immoderate, praises tempt them to detract rather, and to censure one that they hear over-commended. And besides, over-praising a man makes him the object of envy; every man puts in for a share of reputation, and therefore reckons himself injured, if another monopolize it, or have more given him than his share. And the greatest danger of all, is, that it is a temptation to pride; men are apt to think of themselves above what is meet, when others speak of them above what is meet. See how careful blessed Paul was not to be over-valued, 2 Cor. 12. 6.

15. A continual dropping in a very rainy day and a contentious woman are alike. 16. Whosoever hideth her hideth the wind, and the ointment of his right hand, which bewrayeth itself.

Here, as before, Solomon laments the case of him that has a peevish, passionate, wife, that is continually chiding, and making herself, and all about her, uneasy.

1. It is a grievance that there is no avoiding, for it is like a final dropping in a very rainy day. The contentions of a neighbour may be, like a sharp shower, troublesome for the time, yet, while it lasts, one may take shelter; but the contentions of a wife are like a constant soaking rain, for which there is no remedy but patience. See ch. 19. 13.

2. It is a grievance that there is no concealing. A wise man would hide it if he could, for the sake both of his own and his wife's reputation, but he cannot, any more than he can conceal the noise of the wind when it blows, or the smell of a strong perfume. Those that are froward and brawling will proclaim their own shame, even when their friends, in kindness to them, would cover it.

17. Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend.

This bespeaks both the pleasure and the advantage of conversation. One man is nobody; nor will poring upon a book in a corner accomplish a man so as reading and studying of men will. Wise and profitable discourse sharpens men's wits; and those that have ever so much knowledge, may, by conference, have something added to them. It sharpens men's looks, and, by cheering the spirits, puts a briskness and liveliness into the countenance, and gives a man such an air as shews he is pleased himself, and makes him pleasing to those about him. Good men's graces are sharpened by converse with those that are good, and bad men's lusts and passions are sharpened by converse with those that are bad, as iron is sharpened by its like, especially by the file. Men are filed, made smooth, and bright, and fit for business, (who were rough, and dull, and inactive,) by conversation. This is designed,

1. To recommend to us this expedient for sharpening ourselves, but with a caution to take heed whom we choose to converse with, because the influence upon us is so great, either for the better or for the worse.

2. To direct us what we must have in our eye in conversation, to improve both others and ourselves, not to pass away time or banter one another, but to provoke one another to love and to good works, and so to make one another wiser and better.

18. Whoso keepeth the fig-tree shall eat the fruit thereof: so he that waiteth on his master shall be honoured.

This is designed to encourage diligence, faithfulness, and constancy, even in mean employments. Though the calling be laborious and despicable, yet those who keep to it will find there is something to be got by it.

1. Let not a poor gardener, who keeps the fig-tree, be discouraged; though it require constant care and attendance to nurse up fig-trees, and, when they are grown to maturity, to keep them in good order, and gather the figs in their season, he shall be paid for his pains, he shall eat the fruit of it, 1 Cor. 9. 7.

2. Nay, let not a poor servant think himself incapable of thriving and being preferred; for, if he be diligent in waiting on his master, observant of him, and obedient to him; if he keep his master, so the word is; if he do all he can for the securing of his person and reputation, and take care that his estate be not wasted or damaged, such a one shall be honoured; shall not only get a good word, but be preferred and rewarded. God is a Master who has engaged to put an honour on those that serve him faithfully, John, 12. 26.

19. As in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man.

This shews us that there is a way,

1. Of knowing ourselves; as the water is a looking-glass, in which we may see our faces by reflection, so there are mirrors by which the heart of man is discovered to a man, to himself. Let a man examine his own conscience, his thoughts, affections, and intentions. Let him behold his natural face in the gloss of the divine law, (Jam. 1. 23.) and he may discern what kind of man he is, and what is his true character, which it will be of great use to every man rightly to know.

2. Of knowing one another by ourselves; for, as there is a similitude between the face of a man and the reflection of it in the water, so there is between one man's heart and another's; for God has fashioned men's hearts alike; and, in many cases, we may judge of others by ourselves, which is one of the foundations on which that rule is built, of doing to others as we would be done by, Exod. 23. 9. Nihil est unum uni tam simile, tam par, quam omnes inter nosmet ipsos sumus. Sui nemo ipse tam similis quam omnes sunt omnium—No one thing is so like another as man is to man. No person himself is so like as each person is to all besides. Cic. de Legib. lib. 1. One corrupt heart is like another, and so is one sanctified heart, for the former bears the same image of the earthy, the latter the same image of the heavenly.

20. Hell and destruction are never full; so the eyes of man are never satisfied.

Two things are here said to be insatiable, and they are two things near of kin, death and sin.

1. Death is insatiable; the first death, the second death, both are so. The grave is not clogged with the multitude of dead bodies that are daily thrown into it, but is still an open sepulchre, and cries, Give, give; hell also has enlarged itself, and still has room for the damned spirits that are committed to that prison. Tophet is deep and large, Isa. 30. 33.

2. Sin is insatiable; The eyes of man are never satisfied, nor the appetites of the carnal mind toward profit or pleasure; the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor is he that loves silver satisfied with silver. Men labour for that which surfeits, but satisfies not; nay, it is dissatisfying; such a perpetual uneasiness have men justly been doomed to, ever since our first parents were not satisfied with all the trees of Eden, but they must meddle with the forbidden tree. Those whose eyes are ever toward the Lord, in him are satisfied, and shall for ever be so.

21. As the fining pot for silver, and the furnace for gold; so is a man to his praise.

This gives us a touchstone by which we may try ourselves: silver and gold are tried by putting them into the furnace and fining-pot; so is a man tried by praising him. Let him be extolled and preferred, and then he will shew himself what he is.

1. If a man be made, by the applause that is given him, proud, conceited, and scornful; if he take the glory to himself, which he should transmit to God, as Herod did; if, the more he is praised, the more careless he is of what he says and does, if he lie in bed till noon, because his name is up; thereby it will appear that he is a vain foolish man, and a man who, though he be praised, has nothing in him truly praise-worthy.

2. If, on the contrary, a man is made, by his praise, more thankful to God, more respectful to his friends, more watchful against every thing that may blemish his reputation, more diligent to improve himself, and do good to others, that he may answer the expectations of his friends from him, by this it will appear that he is a wise and good man. He has a good temper of mind who knows how to pass by evil report and good report, and is still the same, 2 Cor. 6. 8.

22. Though thou shouldest bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him.

Solomon had said, (ch. 22. 15.) The foolishness which is bound in the heart of a child may be driven out by the rod of correction, for then the mind is to be moulded, the vicious habits not having taken root; but here he shews, that, if it be not done then, it will be next to impossible to do it afterward; if the disease be inveterate, there is a danger of its being incurable. Can the Ethiopian change his skin? Observe,

1. Some are so bad, that rough and severe methods must be used with them, after gentle means have been tried in vain; they must be brayed in a mortar. God will take this way with them: his judgments; the magistrates must take this way with them.

by the rigour of the law. Force must be used with those that will not be ruled by reason, and love, and their own interest.

2. Some are so incorrigibly bad, that even those rough and severe methods do not answer the end, their foolishness will not depart from them; so fully are their hearts set in them to do evil; they are often under the rod, and yet not humbled; in the furnace, and yet not refined; but, like Ahaz, trespass yet more; (2 Chron. 28. 22.) and what remains, then, but that they should be rejected as reprobate silver?

23. Be thou diligent to know the state of thy flocks, and look well to thy herds. 24. For riches are not for ever: and doth the crown endure to every generation? 25. The hay appeareth, and the tender grass sheweth itself, and herbs of the mountains are gathered. 26. The lambs are for thy clothing, and the goats are the price of the field. 27. And thou shalt have goats' milk enough for thy food, for the food of thy household, and for maintenance for thy maidens.

Here is, 1. A command given us to be diligent in our callings; it is directed to husbandmen and shepherds, and those that deal in cattle, but it is to be extended to all other lawful callings; whatever our business is, within doors or without, we must apply our minds to it. This command intimates, (1.) That we ought to have some business to do in this world, and not to live in idleness. (2.) We ought rightly and fully to understand our business, and know what we have to do, and not meddle with that which we do not understand. (3.) We ought to have an eye to it ourselves, and not turn over all the care of it to others; we should, with our own eyes, inspect the state of our flocks; it is the master's eye that makes them fat. (4.) We must be discreet and considerate in the management of our business; know the state of things, and look well to them, that nothing may be lost, no opportunity let slip, but every thing done in proper time and order, and so as to turn to the best advantage. (5.) We must be diligent, and take pains; not only sit down and contrive, but be up and doing; "Set thy heart to thy herds, as one in care; lay thy hands, lay thy bones, to thy business."

2. The reasons to enforce this command. Consider, (1.) The uncertainty of worldly wealth; (v. 24.) Riches are not for ever. [1.] Other riches are not so durable as these are; "Look well to thy flocks and herds, thine estate in the country, and the stock upon that, for these are staple commodities, which, in a succession, will be for ever, whereas riches in trade and merchandise will not be so; the crown itself may, perhaps, not be so sure to thy family as thy flocks and herds. [2.] Even these riches will go to decay, if they be not well looked after. If a man had an abbey, (as we say,) and should be slothful and wasteful, he may make an end of it; even the crown, and the revenues of it, if care be not taken, will suffer damage, nor will it continue to every generation, without very good management. Though David had the crown entailed on his family, yet he looked well to his flocks, 1 Chron. 27. 29, 31.

(2.) The bounty and liberality of nature, or, rather, of the God of nature, and his providence; (v. 25.) The hay appears. In taking care of the flocks and herds, [1.] "There needs no great labour, no ploughing or sowing, the food for them is the spontaneous product of the ground, thou hast nothing to do but to turn them into it in the summer, when the grass shews itself, and to gather the herbs of the mountains for them against winter. God has done his part, thou art ungrateful to him, and unjustly refusest to serve his providence, if thou dost not do thine." [2.] "There is an opportunity to be observed and improved; a time when the hay appears; but, if thou let slip that time, thy flocks and herds will fare the worse for it. As for ourselves, so for our cattle, we ought, with the ant, to provide meat in summer.

(3.) The profit of good husbandry in a family; "Keep thy sheep, and thy sheep will help to keep thee; thou shalt have food for thy children and servants; goats' milk enough; (v. 27.) and enough is as good as a feast. Thou shalt have raiment likewise, the lambs' wool shall be for thy clothing. Thou shalt have money to pay thy rent; the goats thou shalt have to sell shall be the price of thy field;" nay, as some understand it, "Thou shalt become a purchaser, and buy land to leave to thy children," v. 26. Note, [1.] If we have food and raiment, and wherewithal to give every body their own, we have enough, and ought to be not only content, but thankful. [2.] Masters of families must provide not only for themselves, but for their families, and see that their servants have a fitting maintenance. [3.] Plain food and plain clothing, if they be but competent, are all we should aim at. "Reckon thyself well done to, if thou be clothed with home-spun cloth, with the fleece of thy own lambs, and fed with goats' milk; let that serve for thy food which serves for the food of thy household, and the maintenance of thy maidens; be not desirous of dainties, far-fetched and dear bought." [4.] This should encourage us to be careful and industrious about our business, that that will bring in a sufficient maintenance for our families; we shall eat the labour of our hands.

CHAP. XXVIII.

1. THE wicked flee when no man pursueth: but the righteous are bold as a lion.

See here, 1. What continual frights they are subject to that go on in wicked ways; guilt in the conscience makes men a terror to themselves, so that they are ready to flee when none pursues; like one that absconds for debt, who thinks every one he meets a bailiff. Though they pretend to be easy, there are secret fears which haunt them wherever they go, so that they fear where no present or imminent danger is, Ps. 53. 5. They that have made God their Enemy, and know it, cannot but see the whole creation at war with them, and therefore can have no true enjoyment of themselves, no confidence, no courage, but a fearful looking for of judgment. Sin makes men cowards.

Degeneres animos timor arguit—

Fear argues a degenerate soul. VIRG.

Quos diri conscia facti mens habet attonitos—

The consciousness of atrocious crimes astounds and confounds.

Juv.

If they flee when none pursues, what will they do when they shall see God himself pursuing them with his armies? Job, 20. 24. —15. 24. See Deut. 28. 25. Lev. 26. 36.

2. What a holy security and serenity of mind they enjoy who keep conscience void of offence, and so keep themselves in the love of God. The righteous are bold as a lion, as a young lion; in the greatest dangers they have a God of almighty power to trust to; Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed; whatever difficulties they meet with in the way of their duty, they are not daunted by them; None of those things move me.

Hic murus aeneus esto, nil conscire sibi—

Be this thy brazen bulwark of defence,

Still to preserve thy conscious innocence. HOR.

2. For the transgression of a land many are the princes thereof: but by a man of understanding and knowledge the state thereof shall be prolonged.

Note, 1. National sins bring national disorders, and the disturbances of the public repose; For the transgression of a land, and a general defection from God and religion, to idolatry, profaneness, or immorality, many are the princes thereof, many at the same time pretending to the sovereignty, and contending for it, by which the people are crumbled into parties and factions, biting and devouring one another. Or many, successively, in a little time, one cutting off another, as 1 Kings, 16. 8, &c. or soon cut off by the hand of God, or of a foreign enemy, as 2 Kings, 24. 5, &c. As the people suffer for the sins of the prince, so the government sometimes suffers for the sins of the people.

Delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi—

Kings play the madmen, and their people suffer for it;

2. Wisdom will prevent or redress these grievances; By a man, by a people, of understanding, that come again to themselves and their right mind, things are kept in a good order, or, if disturbed, brought back to the old channel again. Or, By a prince of understanding and knowledge, a privy-counsellor, or minister of state, that will restrain or suppress the transgression of the land, and take the right methods of healing the state thereof, the good estate of it will be prolonged. We cannot imagine what a great deal of service one wise man may do to a nation in a critical juncture.

3. A poor man that oppresseth the poor is like a sweeping rain which leaveth no food.

See here, 1. How hard-hearted poor people frequently are to one another; not only not doing such good offices as they might do one to another, but imposing upon, and over-reaching, one another. Those who know by experience the miseries of poverty, should be compassionate to those who suffer the like, but they are inexcusably barbarous if they be injurious to them.

2. How imperious and gripping those commonly are, who, being indigent and necessitous, get into power. If a prince prefer a poor man, he forgets that ever he was poor, and none shall be so oppressive to the poor as he, or squeeze them so cruelly. The hungry leech and the dry sponge suck most. Set a beggar on horseback, and he will ride without merey; he is like a sweeping rain, which washes away the corn in the ground, and lays and beats out that which is grown, so that it leaves no food. Princes, therefore, ought not to put those into places of trust, who are poor, and in debt, and behind-hand in the world, nor any who make it their main business to enrich themselves.

4. They that forsake the law praise the wicked: but such as keep the law contend with them.

Note, 1. Those that praise the wicked make it to appear that they do themselves forsake the law, and go contrary to it, for that curses and condemns the wicked. Wicked people will speak well of one another, and so strengthen one another's hand in their wicked ways, hoping thereby to silence the clamours of their own consciences, and to serve the interests of the Devil's kingdom, which is not done by any thing so effectually as by keeping vice in reputation.

2. Those that do indeed make conscience of the law of God themselves, will, in their places, vigorously oppose sin, and bear their testimony against it, and do what they can to shame and suppress it; they will reprove the works of darkness, and silence the excuses which are made for those works, and do what they can to bring gross offenders to punishment, that others may hear and fear.

5. Evil men understand not judgment: but they that seek the LORD understand all things.

Note, 1. As the prevalency of men's lusts is owing to the darkness of their understandings, so the darkness of their understandings is very much owing to the dominion of their lusts; Men understand not judgment, discern not between truth and falsehood, right and wrong; they understand not the law of God as the rule either of their duty or of their doom; and, (1.) Therefore it is that they are evil men; their wickedness is the effect of their ignorance and error, Eph. 4. 18. (2.) Therefore they understand not judgment, because they are evil men, their corruptions blind their eyes, and fill them with prejudices, and, because they do evil, they hate the light. It is just with God also to give them up to strong delusions.

2. As men's seeking the LORD is a good sign that they do understand much, so it is a good means of their understanding more, even of their understanding all things needful for them. They that set God's glory before them as their end, his favour as their felicity, and his word as their rule, and apply themselves to him upon all occasions by prayer, they seek the LORD, and he will give them the spirit of wisdom. If a man do his will, he shall know his doctrine, John, 7. 17. A good understanding they have, and a better they shall have, that do his commandments, Ps. 111. 10. 1 Cor. 2. 12, 15.

6. Better is the poor that walketh in his uprightness, than he that is perverse in his ways, though he be rich.

Here, 1. It is supposed that a man may walk in his uprightness, and yet be poor in this world; may be poor in the world, which is a temptation to dishonesty, and yet may resist the temptation, and continue to walk in his uprightness: also that a man may be perverse in his ways, injurious to God and man, and yet be rich, and prosper in the world, for a while; may be rich, and so lie under great obligations, and have great opportunities to do good, and yet be perverse in his ways, and do a great deal of hurt.

2. It is maintained as a paradox to a blind world, that an honest, godly, poor man, is better than a wicked, ungodly, rich man; has a better character, is in a better condition, has more comfort in himself, and is a greater blessing to the world, and is worthy of much more honour and respect. It is not only certain that his case will be better at death, but it is better in life. When Aristides was by a rich man upbraided with his poverty, he answered, Thy riches do thee more hurt than my poverty does me.

7. Whoso keepeth the law is a wise son: but he that is a companion of riotous men shameth his father.

Note, 1. Religion is true wisdom, and it makes men wise in every relation; He that conscientiously keeps the law is wise, and he will be particularly a wise son, will act discreetly toward his parents, for the law of God teaches him to do so.

2. Bad company is a great hinderance to religion: Those that are companions of riotous men, that choose such for their companions, and delight in their conversation, will certainly be drawn from keeping the law of God, and drawn to transgress it, Ps. 119. 115.

3. Wickedness is not only a reproach to the sinner himself, but to all that are akin to him; He that keeps rakish company, and spends his time and money with them, not only grieves his parents, but shames them, it turns to their disrepute, as if they had not done their duty to him. They are ashamed that a child of theirs should be scandalous and abusive to their neighbours.

8. He that by usury and unjust gain increaseth his substance, he shall gather it for him that will pity the poor.

Note, 1. That which is ill-got, though it may increase much, will not last long. A man may perhaps raise a great estate, in a little time, by usury and extortion, fraud and oppression of the poor, but it will not continue; he gathers it for himself, but it shall prove to have been gathered for somebody else that he has no kindness for. His estate shall go to decay, and another man's shall be raised out of the ruins of it.

2. Sometimes God, in his providence, so orders it, that that which one got unjustly, another uses charitably; it is strangely turned into the hands of one that will pity the poor, and do good with it, and so cut off the entail of the curse which he brought upon it, who got it by deceit and violence. Thus, the same Providence that punishes the cruel, and disables them to do any more hurt, rewards the merciful, and enables them to do so much the more good. To him that has the ten pounds give the pound which the wicked servant hid in the napkin; for to him that has, and uses it well, more shall be given, Luke, 19. 24. Thus the poor are repaid, the charitable are encouraged, and God is glorified.

9. He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, even his prayer shall be abomination

Note, 1. It is by the word and prayer that our communion with God is kept up. God speaks to us by his law, and expects we should hear him, and heed him; we speak to him by prayer, to which we wait for an answer of peace. How reverent and serious should we be, whenever we are hearing from, and speaking to, the Lord of glory!

2. If God's word be not regarded by us, our prayers shall not only not be accepted of God, but they shall be an abomination to him; not only our sacrifices, which were ceremonial appointments, but even our prayers, which are moral duties, and which, when they are put up by the upright, are so much his delight: see Isa. 1. 11, 15. The sinner, whose prayers God is thus angry at, is one who wilfully and obstinately refuses to obey God's commandments, who will not so much as give them the hearing, but causes his ear to decline the law, and refuses, when God calls; God will, therefore, justly refuse him when he calls: see Prov. 1. 24, 28.

10. Whoso causeth the righteous to go astray in an evil way, he shall fall himself into his own pit: but the upright shall have good things in possession.

Here is, 1. The doom of seducers, who attempt to draw good people, or those who profess to be such, into sin and mischief, who would take a pride in causing the righteous to go astray in an evil way, in drawing them into a snare, that they may insult over them; they shall not gain their point; it is impossible to deceive the elect, but they shall fall themselves into their own pit; and, having been not only sinners, but tempters, not only unrighteous, but enemies to the righteous, their condemnation will be so much the greater, Matth. 23. 14, 15.

2. The happiness of the sincere; they shall not only be preserved from the evil way which the wicked would decoy them into, but they shall have good things, the best things, in possession, the graces and comforts of God's Spirit, beside what they have in reversion.

11. The rich man is wise in his own conceit; but the poor that hath understanding searcheth him out.

Note, 1. Those that are rich are apt to think themselves wise, because, whatever else they are ignorant of, they know how to get and save; and they that are purse-proud expect that all they say should be regarded as an oracle and a law, and that none should dare to contradict them, but every sheaf bow to their's; this humour is fed by flatterers, who, because, like Jezebel's prophets, they are fed at their table, cry up their wisdom.

2. Those that are poor often prove themselves wiser than they; A poor man, who has taken pains to get wisdom, having no other way (as the rich man has) to get a reputation, he searches him out, and makes it to appear that he is not such a scholar, nor such a politician, as he is taken to be. See how variously God dispenses his gifts; to some he gives wealth, to others wisdom, and it is easy to say which of these is the best gift, which we should covet most earnestly.

12. When righteous men do rejoice, there is great glory: but when the wicked rise, a man is hidden.

Note, 1. The comfort of the people of God is the honour of the nation in which they live; There is a great glory dwelling in the land when the righteous do rejoice, when they have their liberty, the free exercise of their religion, and are not persecuted; when the government countenances them, and speaks comfortably to them, when they prosper and grow rich, and much more when they are preferred and employed, and have power put into their hands.

2. The advancement of the wicked is the eclipsing of the beauty of a nation; When the wicked rise, and get head, they make head against all that is sacred, and then a man is hidden, a good man is thrust into obscurity, is necessitated to abscond for his own safety: corruptions prevail so generally, that, as in Elijah's time, there seem to be no good men left, the wicked walk so thick on every side.

13. He that covereth his sins shall not prosper: but whoso confesseth and forsaketh them shall have mercy.

Here is, 1. The folly of indulging sin, of palliating and excusing it, denying or extenuating it, diminishing it, dissembling it, or throwing the blame of it upon others; He that thus covers his sins shall not prosper, let him never expect it; he shall not succeed in his endeavour to cover his sin, for it will be discovered, sooner or later; there is nothing hid which shall not be revealed, a bird of the air shall carry the voice, murder will out, and so will other sins. He shall not prosper, he shall not obtain the pardon of his sin, nor can he have any true peace of conscience. David owns himself to have been in a constant agitation while he covered his sins, Ps. 32. 3, 4. While the patient conceals his distemper he cannot expect a cure.

2. The benefit of parting with it, both by a penitent confession, and a universal reformation; He that confesses his guilt to God, and is careful not to return to sin again, shall find mercy with God, and shall have the comfort of it in his own bosom. His conscience shall be eased, and his ruin prevented: see 1 John, 1. 9. Jer. 3. 12, 13. When we set sin before our face, (as David, My sin is ever before me,) God casts it behind his back.

14. Happy is the man that feareth alway: but he that hardeneth his heart shall fall into mischief.

Here is, 1. The benefit of a holy caution. It sounds strange, but it is very true; Happy is the man that feareth alway. Most people think that they are happy who never fear; but there is a fear which is so far from having torment in it, that it has in it the greatest satisfaction. Happy is the man who always keeps up in his mind a holy awe and reverence of God, his glory, goodness, and government, who is always afraid of offending God, and incurring his displeasure, who keeps conscience tender, and has a dread of the appearance of evil, who is always jealous of himself, distrustful of his own sufficiency, and lives in expectation of troubles and changes, so that, whenever they come, they are no surprise to him. He who keeps up such a fear as this, will live a life of faith and watchfulness, and therefore happy is he, blessed and holy.

2. The danger of a sinful presumption; He that hardens his heart, that mocks at fear, and sets God and his judgments at defiance, and receives not the impressions of his word or rod, he shall fall into mischief, his presumption will be his ruin, and, whatever sin (which is the greatest mischief) he falls into, it is owing to the hardness of his heart.

15. As a roaring lion, and a ranging bear; so is a wicked ruler over the poor people.

It is written indeed, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people; but, if he be a wicked ruler, that oppresses the people, especially the poor people, robbing them of the little they have, and making a prey of them, whatever we may call him, this scripture calls him a roaring lion, and a ranging bear.

1. In respect of his character; he is brutish, barbarous, and blood-thirsty, he is rather to be put among the beasts of prey, the wildest and most savage, than to be reckoned of that noble rank of beings whose glory is reason and humanity.

2. In respect of the mischief they do to their subjects; they are dreadful as the roaring lion, who makes the forest tremble; they are devouring as a hungry bear, and the more necessitous they are, the more mischief they do, and the more greedy of gain they are.

16. The prince that wanteth understanding is also a great oppressor: but he that hateth covetousness shall prolong his days.

Two things are here intimated to be the causes of the maladministration of princes;

1. The love of money, that root of all evil; for hating covetousness here stands opposed to oppression, according to Moses's character of good magistrates, men fearing God and hating covetousness, (Exod. 18. 21.) not only not being covetous, but hating it, and shaking the hands from taking of bribes. A ruler that is covetous will neither do justly nor love mercy, but the people under him shall be bought and sold.

2. Want of consideration; He that hates covetousness shall prolong his government and peace, shall be happy in the affections of his people, and the blessings of his God. It is as much the interest as the duty of princes to reign in righteousness; oppressors therefore and tyrants are the greatest fools in the world, they want understanding, they do not consult their own honour, ease, and safety, but sacrifice all to their ambition of an absolute and arbitrary power. They might be much happier in the hearts of their subjects, than in their necks or estates.

17. A man that doeth violence to the blood of any person shall flee to the pit; let no man stay him.

This agrees with that ancient law, Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, (Gen. 9. 6.) and speaks,

1. The doom of the shedder of blood; He that has committed murder, though he flies for his life, shall be continually haunted with terrors, shall himself flee to the pit, betray himself, and torment himself, like Cain, who, when he had killed his brother, became a fugitive and a vagabond, and trembled continually.

2. The duty of the avenger of blood; Whether the magistrate, or the next of kin, or whoever are concerned in making inquisition for blood, let them be close and vigorous in the prosecution, and let it not be bought off. They that acquit the murderer, or do any thing to help him off, come in sharers in the guilt of blood; nor can the land be purged from blood but by the blood of him that shed it, Numb. 35. 33.

18. Whoso walketh uprightly shall be saved: but he that is perverse in his ways shall fall at once.

Note, 1. Those that are honest are always safe. He that acts with sincerity, that speaks as he thinks, has a single eye, in every thing, to the glory of God and the good of his brethren, that would not, for a world, do an unjust thing, if he knew it, that in all manner of conversation walks uprightly, he shall be saved hereafter. We find a glorious company of those in whose mouth was found no guile, Rev. 14. 5. They shall be safe now. Integrity and uprightness will preserve men, will give them a holy security in the worst of times; for it will preserve their comfort, their reputation, and all their interests; they may be injured, they cannot be hurt.

2. Those that are false and dishonest are never safe; He that is perverse in his ways, that thinks to secure himself by fraudulent practices, by dissimulation and treachery, or by an estate ill-got, he shall fall, nay, he shall fall at once, not gradually, and with warning given, but suddenly, without previous notice, for he is least safe when he is most secure. He falls at once, and so has neither time to guard against his ruin, nor to provide for it; and, being a surprise upon him, it will be so much the greater terror to him.

19. He that tilleth his land shall have plenty of bread: but he that followeth after vain persons shall have poverty enough.

Note, 1. Those that are diligent in their callings take the way to live comfortably; He that tills his land, and tends his shop, and minds his business, whatever it is, he shall have plenty of bread, of that which is necessary for himself and his family, and with which he may be charitable to the poor; he shall eat the labour of his hands.

2. Those that are idle, and careless, and company-keepers, though they indulge themselves in living (as they think) easily and pleasantly, they take the way to live miserably. He that has land, and values himself upon that, but does not till it, neglects his business, will not take pains, but follows after vain persons, drinks with them, joins with them in their frolics and vain sports, and idles away his time with them, he shall have poverty enough, shall be satiated or replenished with poverty, so the word is; he takes those courses which lead so directly to it, that he seems to court it, and he shall have his fill of it.

20. A faithful man shall abound with blessings: but he that maketh haste to be rich shall not be innocent.

Here, 1. We are directed in the true way to be happy, and that is to be holy and honest; He that is faithful to God and man shall be blessed of the Lord, and he shall abound with blessings of the upper and nether springs. Men shall praise him, and pray for him, and be ready to do him any kindness. He shall abound in doing good, and shall himself be a blessing to the place where he lives. Usefulness shall be the reward of faithfulness, and it is a good reward.

2. We are cautioned against a false and deceitful way to happiness, and that is, right or wrong, raising an estate suddenly. Say not, This is the way to abound with blessings; for he that makes haste to be rich, more haste than good speed, he shall not be innocent; and if he be not, he shall not be blessed of God, but, rather, bring a curse upon what he has; nor, if he be not innocent, can he long be easy to himself; he shall not be accounted innocent by his neighbours, but shall have their ill will and ill word. He does not say that he cannot be innocent, but there is all the probability in the world that he will not prove so; He that hasteth with his feet, sinneth, stumbleth, falleth. Sed quæ reverentia loquar, quis metus, aut pudor, est unquam præperantis arari?—What reverence for law, what fear, what shame, was ever indicated by an avaricious man hasting to be rich?

21. To have respect of persons is not good: for for a piece of bread that man will transgress.

Note, 1. It is a fundamental error in the administration of justice, and that which cannot but lead men to abundance of transgression, to consider the parties concerned more than the merits of the cause, so as to favour one because he is a gentleman, a scholar, my countryman, my old acquaintance, has formerly done me a kindness, or may do me one, or is if my party and persuasion; and to bear hard on the other party, because he is a stranger, a poor man, has done me an ill turn, is, or has been, my rival, or if not of my mind, or has voted against me. Judgment is perverted when any consideration of this kind is admitted into the scale, any thing but pure right.

2. Those that are partial will be paltry, those that have once broken through the bonds of equity, though, at first, it must be some great bribe, some noble present, that would bias them, yet, when they have debauched their consciences, they will, at length, be so sordid, that for a piece of bread they will give judgment against their consciences; they will rather play at small game than sit out.

22. He that hasteth to be rich hath an evil eye, and considereth not that poverty shall come upon him.

Here again Solomon shews the sin and folly of those that will be rich; they are resolved that they will be so, per fas, per nefas—right or wrong; they will be so with all speed, they are getting hastily an estate.

1. They have no comfort in it; they have an evil eye, they are always grieving at those that have more than they, and always grudging their necessary expenses, because they think the former keep them from seeming rich, the latter from being so, and between both they must needs be perpetually uneasy.

2. They have no assurance of the continuance of it, and yet take no thought to provide against the loss of it; Poverty shall come upon them, and the riches which they made wings for, that they might fly to them, will make themselves wings to fly from them; but they are secure and improvident, and do not consider this, that while they are making haste to be rich, they are really making haste to be poor, else they would not trust to uncertain riches.

23. He that rebuketh a man, afterwards shall find more favour than he that flattereth with the tongue.

Note, 1. Flatterers may please those for a time, who, upon second thoughts, will detest and despise them. If ever they come to be convinced of the evil of those sinful courses they were flattered in, and to be ashamed of the pride and vanity which were humoured and gratified by those flatteries, they will hate the fawning flatterers, as having had an ill design upon them, and the fulsome flatteries, as having had an ill effect upon them, and being become nauseous.

2. Reprovers may displease those at first, who yet, afterward, when the passion is over, and the bitter physic begins to work well, will love and respect them. He that deals faithfully with his friend, in telling him of his faults, though he may put him into some heat for the present, and perhaps have hard words, instead of thanks, for his pains, yet, afterward, he will not only have the comfort in his own bosom of having done his duty, but he also, whom he reproveth, will acknowledge that it was a kindness, will conceive an opinion of his wisdom and faithfulness, and look upon him as fit to be a friend. He that cries out against his surgeon for hurting him when he is searching his wound, will yet pay him well, and thank him too, when he has cured it.

24. Whoso robbeth his father or his mother, and saith, It is no transgression; the same is the companion of a destroyer.

As Christ shews the absurdity and wickedness of those children who think it is no duty, in some cases, to maintain their parents, (Matth. 15. 5.) so Solomon here shews the absurdity and wickedness of those who think it is no sin to rob their parents, either by force or secretly, by wheedling them or threatening them, or by wasting what they have, and (which is no better than robbing them) running into debt, and leaving them to pay it. Now,

1. This is commonly made light of by untoward children; they say, "It is no transgression, for it will be our own shortly, our parents can well enough spare it we have occasion for it, we cannot live as gentlemen upon the allowance our parents give us, it is too strait for us." With such excuses as these they endeavour to shift off the conviction. But,

2. How light soever an ungoverned youth makes of it, it is really a very great sin; he that does it is the companion of a destroyer; no better than a robber on the highway. What wickedness will he scruple to commit, who will rob his own parents?

25. He that is of a proud heart stirreth up strife:

but he that putteth his trust in the LORD shall be made fat.

Note, 1. Those make themselves lean, and continually unquiet, that are haughty and quarrelsome, for they are opposed to those that shall be made fat; He that is of a proud heart, that is conceited of himself, and looks with a contempt upon all about him, that cannot bear either competition or contradiction, he stirs up strife, makes mischief, and creates disturbance to himself and every body else.

2. Those make themselves fat, and always easy, that live in a continual dependence upon God and his grace; He who puts his trust in the Lord, who, instead of struggling for himself, commits his cause to God, he shall be made fat; he saves the money which others spend upon their pride and contentiousness, he enjoys himself, and has abundant satisfaction in his God; and thus his soul dwells at ease, and he is most likely to have plenty of outward good things. None live so easily, so pleasantly, as those who live by faith.

26. He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool: but whoso walketh wisely, he shall be delivered.

Here is, 1. The character of a fool; he trusts to his own heart, to his own wisdom and counsels, his own strength and sufficiency, his own merit and righteousness, and the good opinion he has of himself; he that does so is a fool, for he trusts to that, not only which is deceitful above all things, (Jer. 17. 9.) but which has often deceived him. This implies, that it is the character of a wise man (as before, v. 25.) to put his trust in the Lord, and in his power and promise, and to follow his guidance, Prov. 3. 5, 6.

2. The comfort of a wise man; He that walks wisely, that trusts not to his own heart, but is humble and self-diffident, and goes on in the strength of the Lord God, he shall be delivered; when the fool, that trusts in his own heart, shall be destroyed.

27. He that giveth unto the poor shall not lack; but he that hideth his eyes shall have many a curse.

Here is, 1. A promise to the charitable; He that gives to the poor shall himself be never the poorer for so doing, he shall not lack; if he have but little, and so be in danger of lacking, let him give out of his little, and that will prevent it from coming to nothing; as the bounty of the widow of Sarepta to Elijah, for whom she made a little cake first, when what she had was reduced to a handful of meal. If he have much, let him give much out of it, and that will prevent its growing less; he and his shall not want what is given in pious charity. What we gave we have.

2. A threatening to the uncharitable; He that hides his eyes, that he may not see the miseries of the poor, nor read their petitions, lest his eye should affect his heart, and extort some relief from him, he shall have many a curse, both from God and man, and neither causeless, and therefore they shall come. Woeful is the condition of that man who has the word of God, and the prayers of the poor, against him.

28. When the wicked rise, men hide themselves: but when they perish, the righteous increase.

This is to the same purport with what we had, v. 12.

1. When bad men are preferred, that which is good is clouded and run down; When power is put into the hands of the wicked, men hide themselves, wise men retire into privacy, and decline public business, not caring to be employed under them; rich men get out of the way, for fear of being squeezed for what they have; and, which is worst of all, good men abscond, despairing to do good, and fearing to be persecuted and ill-treated.

2. When bad men are displaced, degraded, and their power taken from them, then that which is good revives again, then the righteous increase; for, when they perish, good men will be put in their room, who will, by their example and interest, countenance religion and righteousness. It is well with a land when the number of good people increases in it; and it is therefore the policy of all princes, states, and potentates, to encourage them, and to take special care of the good education of youth.

CHAP. XXIX.

1. HE, that being often reprov'd hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy.

Here, 1. The obstinacy of many wicked people in a wicked way is to be greatly lamented. They are often reprov'd by parents and friends, by magistrates and ministers, by the providence of God, and by their own consciences, have had their sins set in order before them, and fair warning given them of the consequences of them, but all in vain, they harden their necks, perhaps they fling away, and will not so much as give the reproof a patient hearing; or, if they do, yet they go on in the sins for which they are reprov'd, they will not bow their necks to the yoke, but are children of Belial, they refuse reproof, (ch. 10. 17.) despise it, (ch. 5. 12.) hate it, ch. 12. 1.

2. The issue of this obstinacy is to be greatly dreaded; They that go on in sin, in despite of admonition, shall be destroyed; those that will not be reformed must expect to be ruined; if the rods answer not the end, expect the axes; they shall be suddenly destroyed, in the midst of their security, and without remedy; they have sinned against the preventing remedy, and therefore let them not expect any recovering remedy. Hell is remediless destruction; they shall be destroyed, and no healing, so the word is. If God wounds, who can heal?

2. When the righteous are in authority, the people rejoice: but when the wicked beareth rule, the people mourn.

This is what was said before, ch. 28. 12, 28.

1. The people will have cause to rejoice, or mourn, according as their rulers are righteous, or wicked; for if the righteous be in authority, sin will be punished and restrained, religion and virtue will be supported and kept in reputation; but if the wicked get power in their hands, wickedness will abound, religion and religious people will be persecuted, and so the ends of government will be perverted.

2. The people will actually rejoice, or mourn, according as their rulers are righteous, or wicked. Such a conviction are even the common people under of the excellency of virtue and religion, that they will rejoice when they see it preferred and countenanced; and, on the contrary, let men have ever so much honour and power, if they be wicked and vicious, and use it ill, they make themselves contemptible and base before all the people, (as those priests, Mal. 2. 9.) and subjects will think themselves miserable under such a government.

3. Whoso loveth wisdom rejoiceth his father: but he that keepeth company with harlots spendeth his substance.

Both the parts of this verse repeat what has been often said, but, on comparing them together, the sense of them will be enlarged from each other.

1. Be it observed, to the honour of a virtuous young man, that he loves wisdom, he is a philosopher, (for that signifies a lover of wisdom,) for religion is the best philosophy; he avoids bad company, and especially the company of lewd women; hereby he rejoices his parents, and has the satisfaction of being a comfort to them, and increases his estate, and is likely to live comfortably.

2. Be it observed, to the reproach of a vicious young man, that he hates wisdom, he keeps company with scandalous women, who will be his ruin, both in soul and body; he grieves his parents, and, like the prodigal son, devours their living with harlots. Nothing will beggar men sooner than the lusts of uncleanness; and the best preservative from those ruinous lusts is wisdom.

4. The king by judgment establisheth the land: but he that receiveth gifts overthroweth it.

Here is, 1. The happiness of a people under a good government. The care and business of a prince should be to establish the land, to maintain its fundamental laws, to settle the minds of his subjects, and make them easy, to secure their liberties and properties from hostilities, and for posterity, and to set in order the things that are wanting; this he must do by judgment, by wise counsels, and by the steady administration of justice, without respect of persons, which will have these good effects.

2. The misery of a people under a bad government; A man of oblations, (so it is in the margin,) overthroweth the land; a man that is either sacrilegious or superstitious, or that invades the priest's office, as Saul and Uzziah; or a man that aims at nothing but getting money, and will, for a good bribe, connive at the most guilty, and, in hope of one, persecute the innocent; such governors as these will ruin a country.

5. A man that flattereth his neighbour spreadeth a net for his feet.

Those may be said to flatter their neighbours, who commend and applaud that good in them, (the good they do, or the good they have,) which really either is not, or is not such as they represent it, and who profess that esteem and that affection for them, which really they have not; these spread a net for their feet.

1. For their neighbours' feet, whom they flatter; they have an ill design in it, they would not speak thus fair, but that they hope to make an advantage of them; and it is therefore wisdom to suspect those who flatter us, that they are secretly laying a snare for us, and to stand on our guard accordingly. Or it has an ill effect on those who are flattered; it puffs them up with pride, and makes them conceited and confident of themselves, and so proves a net that entangles them in sin.

2. For their own feet; so some understand it. He that flatters others, in expectation that they will return his compliments, and flatter him, does but make himself ridiculous and odious even to those he flatters.

6. In the transgression of an evil man there is a snare: but the righteous doth sing and rejoice.

Here is, 1. The peril of a sinful way; there is not only a punishment at the end of it, but a snare in it; one sin is a temptation to another, and there are troubles which, as a snare, come suddenly upon evil men in the midst of their transgressions; nay, their transgression itself often involves them in vexations, their sin is their punishment, and they are holden in the cords of their own iniquity, ch. 5. 22.

2. The pleasantness of the way of holiness. The snare that is in the transgression of evil men spoils all their mirth, but righteous men are kept from those snares, or delivered out of them; they walk at liberty, walk in safety, and therefore they sing and rejoice; they that make God their chief Joy, have him for their exceeding Joy, and it is their own fault if they do not rejoice evermore. If there be any true joy on this side heaven, doubtless they have it whose conversation is in heaven.

7. The righteous considereth the cause of the poor: but the wicked regardeth not to know it.

It is pity but that every one who sues sub forma pauperis—as a pauper, should have an honest cause, (they are of all others inexcusable, if they have not,) because the scripture has so well provided that it should have a fair hearing, and that the judge himself should be of counsel, as for the prisoner, so for the pauper.

1. It is here made the character of a righteous judge, that he considers the cause of the poor; it is every man's duty to consider the poor, (Ps. 41.1.) but the judgment of the poor is to be considered by those that sit in judgment; they must take as much pains to find out the right in a poor man's cause, as in a rich man's. Sense of justice must make both judge and advocate as solicitous and industrious in the poor man's cause, as if they hoped for the greatest advantage.

2. It is made the character of a wicked man, that because it is a poor man's cause, which there is nothing to be got by, he regards not to know it, in the true state of it, for he cares not which way it goes, right or wrong. See Job, 29.16.

8. Scornful men bring a city into a snare: but wise men turn away wrath.

See here, 1. Who are the men that are dangerous to the public, scornful men; when such are employed in the business of the state, they do things with precipitation, because they scorn to deliberate, and will not take time for consideration and consultation; they do things illegal and unjustifiable, because they scorn to be hampered by laws and constitutions; break their faith, because they scorn to be bound by their word; provoke the people, because they scorn to please them; thus they bring a city into a snare by their ill conduct, or, as the margin reads it, they set a city on fire, they sow discord among the citizens, and run them into confusion. Those are scornful men that mock at religion, the obligations of conscience, the fears of another world, and every thing that is sacred and serious; such men are the plagues of their generation, they bring God's judgments upon a land, set men together by the ears, and so bring all to confusion.

2. Who are the men that are the blessings of a land; the wise men, who, by promoting religion, which is true wisdom, turn away the wrath of God, and who, by prudent counsels, reconcile contending parties, and prevent the mischievous consequences of divisions. Proud and foolish men kindle the fires which wise and good men must extinguish.

9. If a wise man contendeth with a foolish man, whether he rage or laugh, there is no rest.

A wise man is here advised not to set his wit to a fool's, not to dispute with him, or, by contending with him, to think either of fastening reason upon him, or gaining right from him; If a wise man contend with a wise man, he may hope to be understood, and, as far as he has reason and equity on his side, to carry his point, at least, to bring the controversy to a head, and make it issue amicably; but if he contend with a foolish man, there is no rest; he will see no end of it, nor will he have any satisfaction in it, but must expect to be always uneasy.

1. Whether the foolish man he contends with, rage or laugh, whether he take angrily or scornfully, what is said to him, whether he rail at it or mock at it, one of the two he will do, and so there will be no rest. However it is given, it will be ill-taken, and the wisest man must expect to be either scolded or ridiculed, if he contend with a fool. He that fights with a dunghill, whether he be conqueror or conquered, is sure to be defiled.

2. Whether the wise man himself rage or laugh, whether he take the serious or the jocular way of dealing with the fool, whether he be severe or pleasant with him, whether he come with a rod or with the spirit of meekness, (1 Cor. 4.21.) it is all alike, no good is done. We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced, mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented.

10. The blood-thirsty hate the upright: but the just seek his soul.

Note, 1. Bad men hate their best friends; The blood-thirsty, all the seed of the old serpent, who was a murderer from the beginning, and inherit his enmity against the seed of the woman, they hate the upright, they seek the ruin of good men, because they condemn the wicked world, and witness against it. Christ told his disciples that they should be hated of all men. Bloody men do especially hate upright magistrates, who would restrain them, and put the laws in execution against them, and so really do them a kindness.

2. Good men love their worst enemies: The just, whom the bloody men hate, seek their soul, pray for their conversion, and would gladly do any thing for their salvation. This Christ taught us, Father forgive them. The just seek his soul, the soul of the upright, whom the bloody hate, so it is commonly understood; seek to protect it from violence, and save it from, or avenge it at, the hands of the blood-thirsty.

11. A fool uttereth all his mind: but a wise man keepeth it in till afterwards.

Note, 1. It is a piece of weakness to be very open; He is a fool who utters all his mind, who tells every thing he knows, and has in his mouth instantly whatever he has in his thoughts, and can keep no counsel; who, whatever is started in discourse, shoots his bolt; who, when he is provoked, will say any thing that comes uppermost, whoever is reflected upon by it; who, when he is to speak of any business, will say all he thinks, and yet never thinks he says enough, whether choice or refuse, corn or chaff, pertinent or impertinent, you shall have it all.

2. It is a piece of wisdom to be upon the reserve; A wise man will not utter all his mind at once, but will take time for a second thought, or reserve the present thought for a fitter time, when it will be more pertinent, and likely to answer his intention; will not deliver himself in a continued speech, or starched discourse, but with pauses, that he may hear what is to be objected, and answer it. Non minus interdum oratorium est tacere quam dicere—True oratory requires an occasional pause. Plin. Ep. 7. 6.

12. If a ruler hearken to lies, all his servants are wicked.

Note, 1. It is a great sin in any, especially in rulers, to hearken to lies; for thereby they not only give a wrong judgment themselves of persons and things, according to the lies they give credit to, but they encourage others to give them wrong informations. Lies will be told to those that will hearken to them; but the receiver, in this case, is as bad as the thief.

2. Those that do so will have all their servants wicked; all their servants will appear wicked, for they will have lies told of them; and they will be wicked, for they will tell lies to them. All that have their ear will fill their ear with slanders, and false characters and representations; and so, if princes, as well as people, will be deceived, they shall be deceived, and, instead of devolving the guilt of their own false judgments upon their servants that misinformed them, they must share in their servants' guilt, and on them will much of the blame lie for encouraging such misinformations, and giving countenance and ear to them.

13. The poor and the deceitful man meet together: the LORD lighteneth both their eyes.

This shews how wisely the great God serves the designs of his providence, by persons of very different tempers, capacities, and conditions in the world; even,

1. By those that are contrary the one to the other. Some are poor, and forced to borrow, others are rich, have a great deal of the mammon of unrighteousness, (deceitful riches they are called,) and they are creditors, or usurers, as it is in the margin. Some are poor, and honest, and laborious, others rich, slothful, and deceitful; they meet together in the business of this world, and have dealings with one another, and the Lord enlightens their eyes, he causes his sun to shine upon both, and gives them both the comforts of this life; to some of both sorts he gives his grace; he enlightens the eyes of the poor, by giving them patience, and of the deceitful, by giving them repentance, as Zaccheus.

2. By those that we think could best be spared. The poor and the deceitful we are ready to look upon as blemishes of Providence, but God makes even them to display the beauty of Providence; he has wise ends only in leaving the poor always with us, but permitting the deceived and the deceiver, for both are his, (Job, 12, 16.) and turn to his praise.

14. The king that faithfully judgeth the poor, his throne shall be established for ever.

Here is, 1. The duty of magistrates, and that is, to judge faithfully between man and man, and to determine all causes brought before them, according to truth and equity; particularly to take care of the poor; not to countenance them in an unjust cause, for the sake of their poverty, (Exod. 23. 3.) but to see that their poverty do not turn to their prejudice, if they have a just cause. The rich will look to themselves, but the poor and needy the prince must defend, (Ps. 82. 3.) and plead for, Prov. 31. 9.

2. The happiness of those magistrates that do their duty; their throne of honour, their tribunal of judgment, shall be established for ever. This will secure to them the favour of God, and strengthen their interest in the affections of their people, both which will be the establishment of their power, and help to transmit it to posterity, and perpetuate it in the family.

15. The rod and reproof give wisdom: but a child left to himself bringeth his mother to shame.

Parents, in educating their children, must consider,

1. The benefit of due correction. They must not only tell their children what is good and evil, but they must chide them, and correct them too, if need be, when they either neglect that which is good, or do that which is evil. If a reproof will serve without the rod, it is well, but the rod must never be used without a rational and grave reproof; and then, though it may be a present uneasiness both to the father and to the child, yet it will give wisdom. Vexatio dat intellectum—Vexation sharpens the intellect. The child will take warning, and so will get wisdom.

2. The mischief of undue indulgence; A child that is not restrained or reprov'd, but is left to himself, as Adonijah was, to follow his own inclinations, he may do well if he will, but if he take to ill courses, nobody will hinder him, it is a thousand to one but he proves a disgrace to his family, and brings his mother, who fondled him, and humoured him in his licentiousness, to shame, to poverty, to reproach, and perhaps will himself be abusive to her, and give her ill language.

16. When the wicked are multiplied, transgression increaseth: but the righteous shall see their fall.

Note, 1. The more sinners there are, the more sin there is; When the wicked, being countenanced by authority, grow numerous, and walk on every side, no marvel if transgression increases, as a plague in the country is said to increase, when still more and more are infected with it. Transgression grows more impudent and bold, more imperious and threatening, when there are many to keep it in countenance. In the old world, when men began to multiply, they began to degenerate, and corrupt themselves and one another.

2. The more sin there is, the nearer is the ruin threatened. Let not the righteous have their faith and hope shocked by the increase of sin and sinners; let them not say that they have cleansed their hands in vain, or that God has forsaken the earth, but wait with patience; the transgressors shall fall, the measure of their iniquity will be full, and then they shall fall from their dignity and power, and fall into disgrace and destruction, and the righteous shall have the satisfaction of seeing their fall, (Ps. 37. 34.) perhaps in this world, at furthest, in the judgment of the great day, when the fall of God's implacable enemies will be the joy and triumph of glorified saints. See Isa. 66. 24. Gen. 19. 28.

17. Correct thy son, and he shall give thee rest; yea, he shall give delight unto thy soul.

Note, 1. It is a very happy thing when children prove the comfort of their parents; good children are so; they give them rest, make them easy, and free from the many cares they have had concerning them; yea, they give delight unto their souls. It is a pleasure to parents, which none know but those that are blessed with it, to see the happy fruit of the good education they have given their children, and to have a prospect of their well-doing for both worlds; it gives delight proportionable to the many thoughts of heart that have been concerning them.

2. In order to this, children must be trained up under a strict discipline, and not suffered to do what they will, and to go without rebuke when they do amiss. The foolishness bound up in their hearts must by correction be driven out, when they are young, or it will break out, to their own and their parents' shame, when they are grown up.

18. Where there is no vision, the people perish: but he that keepeth the law, happy is he.

See here, 1. The misery of the people that want a settled ministry; Where there is no vision, no prophet to expound the law, no priest or Levite to teach the good knowledge of the Lord, no means of grace, the word of the Lord is scarce, there is no open vision: (1 Sam. 3. 1.) where it is so, the people perish; the word has many significations, any of which will apply here; (1.) The people are made naked, stripped of their ornaments, and so exposed to shame; stripped of their armour, and so exposed to danger. How bare does a place look, without Bibles and ministers, and what an easy prey is it to the enemy of souls! (2.) The people rebel, not only against God, but against their prince; good preaching would make people good subjects, but, for want of it, they are turbulent and factious, and despise dominions, because they know no better. (3.) The people are idle, or they play, as the scholars are apt to do when the master is absent; they do nothing to any good purpose, but stand all the day idle, and sporting in the market-place, for want of instruction what to do, and how to do it. (4.) They are scattered as sheep having no shepherd, for want of the masters of assemblies to call them and keep them together, Mark, 6. 34. They are scattered from God and their duty by apostacies, from one another by divisions; God is provoked to scatter them by his judgments, 2 Chron. 15. 3, 5. (5.) They perish; they are destroyed for lack of knowledge, Hos. 4. 6. See what reason we have to be thankful to God for the plenty of open vision which we enjoy!

2. The felicity of a people that have not only a settled, but a successful, ministry among them; the people that hear and keep the law, among whom religion is uppermost; happy are such a people, and every particular person among them. It is not having the law, but obeying it, and living up to it, that will entitle us to blessedness.

19. A servant will not be corrected by words. for though he understand, he will not answer.

Here is the description of an unprofitable, slothful, wicked, servant; a slave that serves not from conscience, or love, but purely from fear. Let those that have such servants put on patience to bear the vexation, and not disturb themselves at it, See their character.

1. No rational words will work upon them; they will not be corrected and reformed, not brought to their business, nor cured of their idleness and laziness, by fair means, no, nor by foul words; even the most gentle master will be forced to use severity with them; no reason will serve their turn, for they are unreasonable.

2. No rational words will be got from them; they are dogged and sullen; and though they understand the questions you ask them, they will not give you an answer; though you make it ever so plain to them, what you expect from them, they will not promise you to mend what is amiss, or to mind their business. See the folly of those servants whose mouth by their silence calls for strokes; they might be corrected by words, and save blows, but they will not.

20. Seest thou a man that is hasty in his words? There is more hope of a fool than of him.

Solomon here shews that there is little hope of bringing a man to wisdom that is hasty, either,

1. Through rashness and inconsideration; Seest thou a man that is hasty in his matters, that is of a light, desultory, wit, that seems to take a thing quick, but takes it by the halves, gallops over a book or science, but takes no time to digest it, no time to pause or muse upon a business? There is more hope of making a scholar, and a wise man, of one that is dull and heavy, and slow in his studies, than of one that has such a mercurial genius, and cannot fix.

2. Through pride and conceitedness; Seest thou a man that is forward to speak to every matter that is started, and affects to speak first to it, to open it, and speak last to it, to give judgment upon it, as if he were an oracle? There is more hope of a modest fool, who is sensible of his folly, than of such a self-conceited one.

21. He that delicately bringeth up his servant from a child shall have him become his son at the length.

Note, 1. It is an imprudent thing in a master to be too fond of a servant, to advance him too fast, and admit him to be too familiar with him; to suffer him to be over-nice and curious in his diet, and clothing, and lodging, and so to bring him up delicately, because he is a favourite, and an agreeable servant; it should be remembered that he is a servant, and, by being thus indulged, will be spoiled for any other place. Servants must endure hardness.

2. It is an ungrateful thing in a servant, but what is very common, to behave himself insolently, because he has been used tenderly. The humble prodigal thinks himself unworthy to be called a son, and is content to be a servant; the pampered slave thinks himself too good to be called a servant, and will be a son of the length, will take his ease and liberty, will be on a par with his master, and perhaps pretend to the inheritance. Let masters give their servants that which is equal and fit for them, and neither more nor less. This is very applicable to the body, which is a servant to the soul; those that delicately bring up the body, that humour it, and are over-tender of it, will find that at length it will forget its place, and become a son, a master, a perfect tyrant.

22. An angry man stirreth up strife, and a furious man aboundeth in transgression.

See here the mischief that flows from an angry, passionate, furious, disposition.

1. It makes men provoking to one another; An angry man stirs up strife, is troublesome and quarrelsome in the family and in the neighbourhood, blows the coals, and even forces those to fall out with him that would live peaceably and quietly by him.

2. It makes men provoking to God; A furious man, who is wedded to his humours and passions, cannot but abound in transgressions; that is a sin which is the cause of many sins; it not only hinders men from calling upon God's name, but it occasions their swearing and cursing, and profaning God's name.

23. A man's pride shall bring him low: but honour shall uphold the humble in spirit.

This agrees with what Christ said more than once,

1. That those who exalt themselves shall be abased. They that think to gain respect by lifting up themselves above their rank, by looking high, talking big, appearing fine, and applauding themselves, will, on the contrary, expose themselves to contempt, lose their reputation, and provoke God by humbling providences to bring them down and lay them low.

2. That those who humble themselves shall be exalted, and shall be established in their dignity; Honour shall uphold the humble in spirit; their humility is their honour, and that shall make them truly and safely great, and recommend them to the esteem of all that are wise and good.

24. Whoso is partner with a thief hateth his own soul: he heareth cursing, and bewrayeth it not.

See here what sin and ruin they involve themselves in, who are drawn away by the enticement of sinners.

1 They incur a great deal of guilt; He doesso, that goes partner with such as rob and defraud, and casts in his lot among them, ch. 1. 11, &c. The receiver is as bad as the thief; and, being drawn in to join with him in the commission of the sin, he cannot escape joining with him in the concealment of it, though it be with the most horrid perjuries and execrations. They hear cursing, when they are sworn to tell the whole truth, but they will not confess.

2. They hasten to utter ruin; they even hate their own souls, for they willfully do that which will be the inevitable destruction of them. See the absurdities sinners are guilty of; they love death, than which nothing is more dreadful, and hate their own souls, than which nothing is more dear.

25. The fear of man bringeth a snare: but whoso putteth his trust in the LORD shall be safe.

Here, 1. We are cautioned not to dread the power of man; neither the power of a prince, nor the power of the multitude; both are formidable enough, but the slavish fear of either brings a snare, exposes men to many insults; (some take a pride in terrifying the timorous;) or, rather, exposes men to many temptations. Abraham, for fear of man, denied his wife, and Peter his Master, and many a one his God and religion. We must not shrink from duty, or commit sin, to avoid the wrath of man, nor, though we see it coming upon us, be disquieted with fear, Dan. 3. 16. Ps. 118. 6. He must himself die, (Isa. 51. 12.) and can but kill our body, Luke, 12. 5.

2. We are encouraged to depend upon the power of God, which would keep us from all that fear of man, which has either torment or temptation in it. Whoso puts his trust in the Lord, for protection and supply in the way of duty, he shall be set on high, above the power of man, and above the fear of that power. A holy confidence in God makes a man both great and easy, and enables him to look with a gracious contempt upon the most formidable designs of hell and earth against him. If God be my Salvation, I will trust, and not be afraid.

26. Many seek the ruler's favour; but every man's judgment cometh from the LORD.

See here, 1. What is the common course men take to advance and enrich themselves, and make themselves great; they seek the ruler's favour, and, as if all their judgment proceeded from him, to him they make all their court. Solomon was himself a ruler, and knew with what sedulity men made their application to him, some on one errand, others on another, but all for his favour. It is the way of the world to make interest with great men, and expect much from the smiles of second causes, which yet are uncertain, and frequently disappoint them. Many take a great deal of pains in seeking the ruler's favour, and yet cannot have it; many have it for a little while, but they cannot keep themselves in it, by some little turn or other they are brought under his displeasure; many have it, and keep it, and yet it does not answer their expectation, they cannot make that hand of it, that they promised themselves they should. Haman had the ruler's favour, and yet it availed him nothing.

2. What is the wisest course men can take to be happy; let them look up to God, and seek the favour of the Ruler of rulers; for every man's judgment proceeds from the Lord. It is not with us as the ruler pleases; his favour cannot make us happy, his frowns cannot make us miserable; but it is as God pleases; every creature is that to us that God makes it to be, no more and no other; he is the first Cause on which all second causes depend; if he help not, they cannot, 2 Kings, 6. 27. Job, 34. 29.

27. An unjust man is an abomination to the just: and he that is upright in the way is abomination to the wicked.

This bespeaks not only the innate contrariety that there is between virtue and vice, as between light and darkness, fire and water, but the old enmity that has always been between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, Gen. 3. 15.

1. All that are sanctified have a rooted antipathy to wickedness and wicked people. They have a good will to the souls of all; (God has so, and would have none perish;) but they hate the ways and practices of those that are impious toward God, and injurious toward men; they cannot hear of them, or speak of them, without a holy indignation; they loathe the society of the ungodly and unjust, and dread the thought of giving them any countenance, but do all they can to bring the wickedness of the wicked to an end. Thus an unjust man makes himself odious to the just, and it is one part of his present shame and punishment, that good men cannot endure him.

2. All that are unsanctified have a like rooted antipathy to godliness and godly people; He that is upright in the way, that makes conscience of what he says and does, is an abomination to the wicked, whose wickedness is restrained perhaps, and suppressed, or, however, shamed and condemned, by the uprightness of the upright. Thus Cain did, who was of his father the Devil. And this is not only the wickedness of the wicked, that they hate those whom God loves, but their misery too, that they hate those whom they shall shortly see in everlasting bliss and honour, and who shall have dominion over them in the morning, Ps. 49. 14.

CHAP. XXX.

This end the following chapter are an appendix to Solomon's proverbs; but they are both expressly called prophecies, in the first verses of both; by which it appears, that the penmen of them, whoever they were, were divinely inspired. This chapter was penned by one that bears the name of Agur Ben Jakeh. What tribe he was of, or when he lived, we are not told; what he wrote, being indited by the Holy Ghost, is here kept upon record. We have here, I. His confession of faith, v. 1..6. II. His prayer, v. 7..9. III. A caution against wronging servants, v. 10. IV. Four wicked generations, v. 11..14. V. Four things insatiable, (v. 15. 16.) to which is added, fair warning to undutiful children, v. 17. VI. Four things unsearchable, v. 18..20. VII. Four things intolerable, v. 21..23. VIII. Four things little and wise, v. 24..28. IX. Four things stately, v. 29. to the end.

1. THE words of Agur the son of Jakeh, even the prophecy: the man spake unto Ithiel, even unto Ithiel and Ucal. 2. Surely I am more brutish than any man, and have not the understanding of a man. 3. I neither learned wisdom, nor have the knowledge of the holy. 4. Who hath ascended up into heaven, or descended? who hath gathered the wind in his fists? who hath bound the waters in a garment? who hath established all the ends of the earth? what is his name, and what is his son's name, if thou canst tell? 5. Every word of God is pure: he is a shield unto them that put their trust in him. 6. Add thou not unto his words, lest he reprove thee, and thou be found a liar.

Some make Agur to be not the name of this author, but his character; he was a collector, so it signifies; a gatherer; one that did not compose things himself, but collected the wise sayings and observations of others; made abstracts of the writings of others; which some think is the reason why he says, (v. 3.) "I have not learned wisdom myself, but have been a scribe, or amanuensis, to other wise and learned men." Note, We must not bury our talent, though it be but one, but, as we have received the gift, so minister the same, if it be but to collect what others have written. But we rather suppose it to be his name, which, no doubt, was well known then, though not mentioned elsewhere in scripture.

Ithiel and Ucal are mentioned, either,

1. As the names of his pupils, whom he instructed, or who consulted him as an oracle, having a great opinion of his wisdom and goodness. Probably, they wrote from him what he dictated, as Baruch wrote from the mouth of Jeremiah, and by their means it was preserved, and they were ready to attest it to be his, for it was spoken to them; they were two witnesses of it. Or,

2. As the subject of his discourse. Ithiel signifies God with me, the application of Immanuel, God with us. The word calls him God with us; faith appropriates this, and calls him "God with me, who loved me, and gave himself for me, and into union and communion with whom I am admitted." Ucal signifies the Mighty One, for it is upon one that is mighty, that help is laid for us. Many good interpreters therefore apply this to the Messiah, for to him all the prophecies bear witness, and why not this then? It is what Agur spake concerning Ithiel, even concerning Ithiel (that is the name on which the stress is laid) and Ucal. The mighty God, (Isa. 9. 6.) with us, Isa. 7. 14.

Three things the prophet here aims at,

I. To abase himself. Before he makes confession of his faith, he makes confession of his folly, and the weakness and deficiency of reason, which make it so necessary that we be guided and governed by faith. Before he speaks concerning the Saviour, he speaks of himself as needing a Saviour, and as nothing without him; we must go out of ourselves before we go into Jesus Christ.

1. He speaks of himself as wanting a righteousness, and having done foolishly, very foolishly. When he reflects upon himself, he owns, Surely I am more brutish than any man. Every man is become brutish, Jer. 10. 14. But he that knows his own heart, knows so much more evil of himself than he does of any other, that he cries out, "Surely I cannot but think that I am more brutish than any man, surely no man has such a corrupt deceitful heart as I have. I have acted as one that has not the understanding of Adam, as one that is wretchedly degenerated from the knowledge and righteousness in which man was at first created; nay, I have not the common sense and reason of a man, else I had not done as I have done." Agur, when he was applied to by others, as wiser than most, acknowledges himself more foolish than any. Whatever high opinion others may have of us, 't becomes us to have low thoughts of ourselves.

2. He speaks of himself as wanting a revelation to guide him in the ways of truth and wisdom. He owns, (v. 3.) "I neither learned wisdom by any power of my own, the depths of it cannot be fathomed by my line and plummet, nor know I the knowledge of the holy ones, the angels, our first parents in innocency, nor of the holy things of God, I can get no insight into them, nor make any judgment of them, further than God is pleased to make them known to me." The natural man, the natural powers, perceive not, nay they receive not, the things of the Spirit of God. Some suppose Agur to be asked, as Apollo's oracle was of old, Who was the wisest man? The answer is, He that is sensible of his own ignorance, especially in divine things. Hoc tantum scio, me nihil scire—All that I know is, that I know nothing.

II. To advance Jesus Christ, and the Father in him; (v. 4.) Who hath ascended up into heaven, &c.

1. Some understand this of God, and of his works, which are both incomparable and unsearchable. He challenges all mankind to give an account of the heavens above, of the winds, the waters, the earth; "Who can pretend to have ascended up to heaven, to take a view of the orbs above, and then to have descended, to give us a description of them? Who can pretend to have had the command of the winds, to have grasped them in his hand, and managed them, as God does, or to have bound the waves of the sea with a swaddling band, as God has done? Who has established the ends of the earth, or can describe the strength of its foundations, or the extent of its limits? Tell me what is the man's name who can undertake to vie with God, or to be of his cabinet council, or, if he be dead, what is his name to whom he has bequeathed this great secret."

2. Others refer it to Christ, to Ithiel and Ucal, the Son of God, for it is the Son's name, as well as the Father's, that is here inquired after, and a challenge given to any to compare with him. We must now exalt Christ as one revealed, they then magnified him as one concealed; as one they had heard something of, but had very dark and defective ideas of. We have heard the fame of him with our ears, but cannot describe him; (Job, 28. 22.) certainly it is God that has gathered the wind in his fists, and bound the waters as in a garment: but what is his name? It is,

I am that I am, (Exod. 3. 14.) a name to be adored, not to be understood. What is his Son's name, by whom he doeth all these things? The Old-Testament saints expected the Messiah to be the Son of the Blessed, and he is here spoken of as a Person distinct from the Father, but his name as yet secret. Note, The great Redeemer, in the glories of his providence and grace, can neither be paralleled, nor found out to perfection. (1.) The glories of the kingdom of his grace are unsearchable and unparalleled; for who besides has ascended into heaven, and descended? Who besides is perfectly acquainted with both worlds, and has himself a free correspondence with both, and is therefore fit to settle a correspondence between them, as Mediator, as Jacob's ladder? He was in heaven in the Father's bosom, (John, 1. 1, 18.) thence he descended to take our nature upon him; and never was there such condescension! In that nature he again ascended, (Eph. 4. 9.) to receive the promised glories of his exalted state; and who besides has done this? Rom. 10. 6. (2.) The glories of the kingdom of his providence are likewise unsearchable and unparalleled. The same that reconciles heaven and earth was the Creator of both, and governs and disposes of all. He specifies in his government the three lower elements of air, water, and earth. [1.] The motions of the air are of his directing. Satan pretends to be the prince of the power of the air, but even there Christ has all power, he rebuked the winds, and they obeyed him. [2.] The bounds of the water are of his appointing; He binds them as in a garment; hitherto they shall come, and no further, Job, 38. 9.. 11. [3.] The foundations of the earth are of his establishing; he founded it at first, he upholds it still; if Christ had not interposed, the foundations of the earth had sunk under the load of the curse upon the ground, for man's sin. Who, and what, is the mighty He that doeth all this? We cannot find out God, nor the Son of God, unto perfection. Oh the depth of that knowledge!

III. To assure us of the truth of the word of God, and to recommend it to us, v. 5, 6. Agur's pupils expect to be instructed by him in the things of God; "Alas," says he, "I cannot undertake to instruct you; go to the word of God, see what he has there revealed of himself, and of his mind and will; you need know no more than what that will teach you, and that you may rely upon, as sure and sufficient. Every word of God is pure; there is not the least mixture of falsehood and corruption in it." The words of men are to be heard and read with jealousy, and with allowance, but there is not the least ground to suspect any deficiency in the Word of God; it is as silver purified seven times, (Ps. 12. 6.) without the least dross or alloy; Thy word is very pure, Ps. 119. 140.

1. It is sure, and therefore we must trust to it, and venture our souls upon it. God in his word, God in his promise, is a Shield, a sure Protection, to all them that put themselves under his protection, and put their trust in him. The word of God, applied by faith, will make us easy in the midst of the greatest dangers, Ps. 46. 1, 2.

2. It is sufficient, and therefore we must not add to it; (v. 6.) Add thou not unto his words, because they are pure and perfect. This forbids the advancing of any thing, not only in contradiction to the word of God, but in competition with it; though it be under the plausible pretence of explaining it, yet if it pretend to be of equal authority with it, it is adding to his words, which is not only a reproach to them as insufficient, but opens a door to all manner of errors and corruptions; for, that one absurdity being granted, that the word of any man, or company of men, is to be received with the same faith and veneration as the word of God, a thousand follow. We must be content with what God has thought fit to make known to us of his mind, and not covet to be wise above what is written; for, (1.) God will resent it as a heinous affront; "He will reprove thee, will reckon with thee as a traitor against his crown and dignity, and lay thee under the heavy doom of those that add to his words, or diminish from them," Deut. 4. 2.—12. 32. (2.) We shall run ourselves into endless mistakes; "Thou wilt be found a liar, a corrupter of the word of truth, a breacher of heresies, and guilty of the worst of forgeries, counterfeiting the broad seal of heaven, and pretending a divine mission, and inspiration, when it is all a cheat. Men may be thus deceived, but God is not mocked."

7. Two things have I required of thee: deny me them not before I die: 8. Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me: 9. Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the LORD? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain.

After Agur's confession and creed, here follows his litany; where we may observe,

1. The preface to his prayer; Two things have I required, that is, requested, of thee, O God. Before we go to pray, it is good to consider what we need, and what the things are which we have to ask of God. What does our case require? What do our hearts desire? What would we that God should do for us? That we may not be to seek for our petition and request, when we should be presenting it. He begs, Deny me not before I die. In praying, we should think of dying, and pray accordingly. "Lord, give me pardon, and peace, and grace, before I die, before I go hence, and be no more; for if I be not renewed and sanctified before I die, it will not be done after; if I do not prevail in prayer before I die, prayers after will not prevail, no, not Lord, Lord. There is none of this wisdom or working in the grave. Deny me not thy grace, for if thou do, I die; I perish, if thou be silent to me, I am like them that go down to the pit, Ps. 28. 1. Deny me not before I die; as long as I continue in the land of the living, let me continue under the conduct of thy grace and good providence."

II. The prayer itself; the two things he requires, grace sufficient, and food convenient.

1. Grace sufficient for his soul; "Remove from me vanity and lies; deliver me from sin, from all corrupt principles, practices, and affections, from error and mistake, which are at the bottom of all sin; from the love of the world and the things of it, which are all vanity and a lie." Some understand it as a prayer for the pardon of sin, for when God forgives sin, he removes it, he takes it away. Or rather, it is a prayer of the same import with that, Lead us not into temptation. Nothing is more mischievous to us than sin, and therefore there is nothing which we should more earnestly pray against than that we may do no evil.

2. Food convenient for his body. Having prayed for the operations of divine grace, he here begs the favours of the Divine Providence, but such as may tend to the good, and not to the prejudice, of the soul.

(1.) He prays, that, of God's free gift, he might receive a competent portion of the good things of this life; "Feed me with the bread of my allowance; such bread as thou thinkest fit to allow me." As to all the gifts of the Divine Providence, we must refer ourselves to the Divine Wisdom. Or, "the bread that is fit for me, as a man, a master of a family; that which is agreeable to my rank and condition in the world." For as is the man, so is his competency. Our Saviour seems to refer to this, when he teaches us to pray, Give us this day our daily bread; as this seems to refer to Jacob's vow, in which he wished for no more than bread to eat, and raiment to put on. Food convenient for us is what we ought to be content with, though we have not dainties, varieties, and superfluities; what is for necessity, though we have not for delight and ornament; and it is what we may in faith pray for, and depend upon God for.

(2.) He prays that he may be kept from every condition of life that would be a temptation to him.

[1.] He prays against the extremes of abundance and want; Give me neither poverty nor riches. He does not hereby prescribe to God, nor pretend to teach him what condition he shall allot to him, nor does he pray against poverty or riches absolutely, as in themselves evil, for either of them, by the grace of God, may be sanctified, and be a means of good to us; but, First, He hereby intends to express the value which wise and good men have for a middle state of life, and, with submission to the will of God, desires that that might be his state: neither great honour, nor great contempt. We must learn how to manage both, (as St. Paul, Phil. 4. 12.) but rather wish to be always between both. Optimus pecunie modus qui nec in paupertate cedit, nec procul à paupertate discedit—The best condition is that which neither implies poverty, nor yet recedes far from it. Seneca. Secondly, He hereby intimates a holy jealousy he had of himself, that he could not keep his ground against the temptations either of an afflicted, or a prosperous, condition. Others may preserve their integrity in either, but he is afraid of both, and therefore grace teaches him to pray against riches, as much as nature against poverty; but the will of the Lord be done.

[2.] He gives a pious reason for his prayer; (v. 9.) he does not say, “Lest I be rich, and cumbered with care, and envied by my neighbours, and eaten up with a multitude of servants,” or, “Lest I be poor, and trampled on, and forced to work hard, and fare hard;” but, “Lest I be rich, and sin, or poor, and sin.” Sin is that which a good man is afraid of in every condition, and under every event; witness Nehemiah, (ch. 6. 13.) that I should be afraid, and do so, and sin.

First, He dreads the temptations of a prosperous condition, and therefore even deprecates that; Lest I be full, and deny thee, (as Jeshurun, who roared fat, and kicked, and forsook God who made him, Deut. 32. 15.) and say, as Pharaoh in his pride, Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice? Prosperity makes people proud, and forgetful of God, as if they had no need of him, and were therefore under no obligation to him. What can the Almighty do for them? (Job, 22. 17.) And therefore they will do nothing for him. Even good men are afraid of the worst sins, so deceitful do they think their own hearts to be; and they know that the greatest gains of the world will not balance the least guilt.

Secondly, He dreads the temptations of a poor condition, and for that reason, and no other, deprecates that; Lest I be poor, and steal. Poverty is a strong temptation to dishonesty, and such as many are overcome by, who are also ready to think it will be their excuse; but it will not bear them out at God's bar, any more than at men's, to say, “I stole because I was poor;” yet if a man steal for the satisfying of his soul when he is hungry, it is a case of compassion, (ch. 6. 30.) and what even those that have some principles of honesty in them may be drawn to. But observe why Agur dreads this; not because he should endanger himself by it, “Lest I steal, and be hanged for it, whipt, or put into the stocks, or sold for a bondman; as among the Jews poor thieves were, who had not wherewithal to make restitution; but lest he should dishonour God by it; “Lest I should steal, and take the name of my God in vain, discredit my profession of religion by practices disagreeable to it.” Or, “Lest I steal, and, when I am charged with it, forswear myself.” He therefore dreads one sin, because it would draw on another, for the way of sin is down-hill. Observe, He calls God his God, and therefore he is afraid of doing any thing to offend him, because of the relation he stands in to him.

10. Accuse not a servant unto his master, lest he curse thee, and thou be found guilty.

11. There is a generation that curseth their father, and doth not bless their mother. 12. There is a generation that are pure in their own eyes, and yet is not washed from their filthiness. 13. There is a generation, O how lofty are their eyes! and their eyelids are lifted up. 14. There is a generation, whose teeth are as swords, and their jaw teeth as knives, to devour the poor from off the earth, and the needy from among men.

Here is, 1. A caution not to abuse other people's servants any more than our own, nor to make mischief between them and their masters, for it is an ill office, invidious, and what will make a man odious, v. 10. Consider, (1.) It is an injury to the servant, whose poor condition makes him an object of pity, and therefore it is barbarous to add affliction to him that is afflicted; Hurt not a servant with thy tongue, so the margin reads it; for it argues a sordid disposition to smite any body secretly with the scourge of the tongue, especially a servant, who is not a match for us, and whom we should rather protect, if his master be severe with him, than exasperate him more. (2.) “It will perhaps be an injury to thyself; if a servant be thus provoked, perhaps he will curse thee, will accuse thee, and bring thee into trouble; or give thee an ill word, and blemish thy reputation; or appeal to God against thee, and imprecate his wrath upon thee, who is the Patron and Protector of oppressed innocency.”

2. An account, upon occasion of this caution, of some wicked generations of men, that are justly abominable to all that are virtuous and good.

(1.) Such as are abusive to their parents, give them bad language, and wish them ill, call them bad names, and actually injure them; there is a generation of such; young men of that black character commonly herd together, and irritate one another against their parents; a generation of vipers they are, who curse: either their natural parents, or their magistrates, or their ministers, because they cannot endure the yoke; and they are near of kin to them, who, though they are not yet arrived at such a pitch of wickedness as to curse their parents, yet do not bless them, cannot give them a good word, and will not pray for them.

(2.) Such as are conceited of themselves, and, under a shew and pretence of sanctify, hide from others, and perhaps from themselves too, abundance of reigning wickedness in secret; (v. 12.) they are pure in their own eyes, as if they were in all respects such as they should be; they have a very good opinion of themselves and their own character, that they are not only righteous, but rich and increased with goods, (Rev. 3. 17.) and yet are not cleansed from their filthiness, the filthiness of their hearts, which they pretend to be the best part of them; they are, it maybe, swept and garnished, but they are not washed, not sanctified; as the Pharisees that within were full of all uncleanness, Matth. 23. 25, 26.

(3.) Such as are haughty and scornful to those about them, v. 13. He speaks of them with amazement at their intolerable pride and insolence; Oh how lofty are their eyes! With what disdain do they look upon their neighbours, as not worthy to be set with the dogs of their flock! What a distance do they expect every body should keep; and when they look upon themselves, how do they strut and vaunt, like the peacock, thinking they make themselves illustrious, when really they make themselves ridiculous! There is a generation of such, on whom he that resists the proud will pour contempt.

(4.) Such as are cruel to the poor, and barbarous to all that lie at their mercy; (v. 14.) their teeth are iron and steel, swords and knives, instruments of cruelty, with which they devour the poor with the greatest pleasure imaginable, and as greedily as hungry men eat their meat, and eat it. God has so ordered it, that the poor we shall have always with us, that they shall never cease out of the land; but there are those who, because they hate to relieve them, would, if they could, abolish them from the earth, from among men; especially God's poor. Some understand it of those who wound and ruin others by slanders and false accusations, and severe censures of their everlasting state; their tongues, and their teeth too, (which are likewise organs of speech,) are as swords and knives, Ps. 57. 4.

15. The horseleech hath two daughters, crying, Give, give. There are three things that are never satisfied, yea, four things say not, It is enough:

16. The grave; and the barren womb; the earth that is not filled with water; and the fire that saith not, It is enough. 17. The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it.

He had spoken before of those that devoured the poor, (v. 14.) and had spoken of them last, as the worst of all the four generations there mentioned; now here he speaks of their insatiableness in doing this. The temper that puts them upon it is made up of cruelty and covetousness; those are two daughters of the horsesleece, its genuine offspring, that still cry, "Give, give, give more blood, give more money;" for the bloody are still blood-thirsty; being drunk with blood, they add thirst to their drunkenness, and will seek it yet again. They also that love silver shall never be satisfied with silver. Thus, while from these two principles they are devouring the poor, they are continually uneasy to themselves, as David's enemies, Ps. 59. 14, 15.

Now, 1. For the further illustration of this, he specifies four other things which are insatiable, to which those devourers are compared, which say not, It is enough; or, It is wealth. Those are never rich that are always coveting. Now these four things that are always craving, are, (1.) The grave into which multitudes fall, and yet still more will fall, and it swallows them all up, and returns none. Hell and destruction are never full, ch. 27. 20. When it comes to our turn, we shall find the grave ready for us, Job, 17. 1. (2.) The barren womb, which is impatient of its affliction in being barren, and cries, as Rachel did, Give me children. (3.) The parched ground in time of drought, (especially in those hot countries,) which still soaks in the rain that comes in abundance upon it, and in a little time wants more. (4.) The fire, which, when it has consumed abundance of fuel, yet still devours all the combustible matter that is thrown into it. So insatiable are the corrupt desires of sinners, and so little satisfaction have they even in the gratification of them.

2. He adds a terrible threatening to disobedient children, (v. 17.) for warning to the first of those four wicked generations that curse their parents, (v. 11.) and shews here, (1.) Who they are that belong to that generation; not only they that curse their parents in heat and passion, but, [1.] They that mock at them, though it be but with a scornful eye, looking with disdain upon them, because of their bodily infirmities, or looking sour or dogged at them when they instruct or command, impatient at their checks, and angry at them. God takes notice with what eye children look upon their parents, and will reckon for the leering look and the casts of an evil eye, as well as for bad language given them. [2.] They that despise to obey them, that think it a thing below them to be dutiful to their parents, especially to the mother, they scorn to be controlled by her; and thus she that bare them in sorrow, in greater sorrow bears their manners. (2.) What their doom will be. They that dishonour their parents shall be set up as monuments of God's vengeance; they shall be hanged in chains, as it were, for the birds of prey to pick out their eyes, those eyes with which they looked so scornfully on their good parents. The dead bodies of malefactors were not to hang all night, but before night the ravens would have picked out their eyes. If men do not punish undutiful children, God will, and will load those with the greatest infamy that conduct themselves haughtily toward their parents. Many who have come to an ignominious end, have owned that the wicked courses that brought them to it began in a contempt of their parents' authority.

18. There be three things which are too wonderful for me, yea, four which I know not: 19. The way of an eagle in the air; the way of a serpent upon a rock; the way of a ship in the midst of the sea; and the way of a man with a maid. 20. Such is the way of an adulterous woman; she eateth, and wipeth her mouth, and saith, I have done no wickedness. 21. For three things the earth is disquieted, and for four which it cannot bear: 22. For a servant when he reigneth; and a fool when he is filled with meat; 23. For an odious woman when she is married; and a handmaid that is heir to her mistress.

Here is,

I. An account of four things that are unsearchable, too wonderful to be fully known. And here,

1. The three first are natural things, and are only designed as comparisons for the illustration of the last. We cannot trace, (1.) An eagle in the air; which way she is flown cannot be discovered, either by the footstep or by the scent, as the way of a beast may upon the ground; nor can we account for the wonderful swiftness of her flight, how soon she is gone beyond our ken. (2.) A serpent upon a rock. The way of a serpent in the sand we may find by the track, but not of a serpent upon the hard rock; nor can we describe how a serpent will, without feet, in a little time creep to the top of a rock. (3.) A ship in the midst of the sea. The leviathan, indeed, makes a path to shine after him, one would think the deep to be hoary, (Job, 41. 32.) but a ship leaves no mark behind it, and sometimes it is so tossed upon the waves, that one would wonder how it lives at sea, and gains its point. The kingdom of nature is full of wonders; marvellous things which the God of nature does, past finding out.

2. The fourth is a mystery of iniquity, more unaccountable than any of these; it belongs to the depths of Satan, that deceitfulness, and that desperate wickedness of the heart, which none can know, Jer. 17. 9. It is twofold,

(1.) The cursed arts which a vile adulterer has to debauch a maid, and to persuade her to yield to his wicked and abominable lust; this is what a wanton poet wrote a whole book of, long since, De arte amandi—On the art of love. By what pretensions and protestations of love, and all its powerful charms, promises of marriage, assurances of secrecy and reward, is many an unwary virgin brought to sell her virtue, and honour, and peace, and soul, and all to a base traitor; for so all sinful lust is in the kingdom of love. The more artfully the temptation is managed, the more watchful and resolute ought every pure heart to be against it.

(2.) The cursed arts which a vile adulteress has to conceal her wickedness, especially from her husband, from whom she treacherously departs; so close are her intrigues with her lewd companions, and so craftily disguised, that it is as impossible to discover her as to track an eagle in the air. She eats the forbidden fruit, after the similitude of Adam's transgression, and then wipes her mouth, that it may not betray itself, and, with a bold and impudent face, says, I have done no wickedness. [1.] To the world she denies the fact, and is ready to swear it, that she is as chaste and modest as any woman, and never did the wickedness she is suspected of. They are works of darkness, which are industriously kept from coming to the light. [2.] To her own conscience (if she have any left) she denies the fault, and will not own that that great wickedness is any wickedness at all, but an innocent entertainment. See Hos. 12. 7, 8. Thus multitudes ruin their souls by calling evil good, and out-facing their convictions with a self-justification.

II. An account of four things that are intolerable, that is, four sorts of persons that are very troublesome to the places where they live, and the relations and companies they are in; the earth is disquieted for them, and groans under them as a burthen it cannot bear, and they are all much alike. 1. A servant when he is advanced, and intrusted with power, who is, of all others, most insolent and imperious; witness Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, Neh. 2. 10. 2. A fool, a silly, rude, boisterous, vicious man, when he is grown rich, and is partaking of the pleasures of the table, will disturb all the company with his extravagant talk, and the affronts he will put upon those about him. 3. An ill-natured, cross-grained, woman, when she gets a husband; who, having made herself odious by her pride and sourness, so that one would not have thought any body should have loved her, yet, if at last she be married, that honourable estate makes her more intolerably scornful and spiteful than ever. It is pity that which should sweeten the disposition, should have a contrary effect. A gracious woman, when she is married, will be yet more obliging.

4. An old maid-servant that has prevailed with her mistress, by humouring her, and, as we say, getting the length of her foot, to leave her what she has, or is as dear to her as if she was to be her heir, such a one likewise will be intolerably proud and malicious, and think all too little that her mistress gives her, and herself wronged if any thing be left from her. Let those, therefore, whom Providence has advanced to honour from mean beginnings, carefully watch against that sin which will most easily beset them, pride and haughtiness, which will in them, of all others, be most insufferable and inexcusable; and let them humble themselves with the remembrance of the rock out of which they were hewn.

24. There be four things which are little upon the earth, but they are exceeding wise; 25. The ants are a people not strong, yet they prepare their meat in the summer; 26. The conies are but a feeble folk, yet make they their houses in the rocks; 27. The locusts have no king, yet go they forth all of them by bands; 28. The spider taketh hold with her hands, and is in kings' palaces.

Agur, having specified four things, that seem great, and yet are really contemptible, here specifies four things that are little, and yet are very admirable, great in miniature; in which, as Bishop Patrick observes, he teaches us several good lessons; as, 1. Not to admire bodily bulk, or beauty, or strength, or to value persons, or think the better of them, for that, but to judge of men by their wisdom and conduct, their industry and application to business, which are characters that deserve respect. 2. To admire the wisdom and power of the Creator in the smallest and most despicable animals, in an ant as much as in an elephant. 3. To blame ourselves who do not act so much for our own interest as the meanest creatures do for their's. 4. Not to despise the weak things of the world; there are those that are little upon the earth, poor in the world, and of small account, and yet are exceeding wise, wise for their souls and another world, and those are exceeding wise, wiser than their neighbours. Margin. They are wise, made wise by the special instinct of nature; all that are wise to salvation, are made wise by the grace of God. Those he specifies are,

(1.) The ants; minute animals, and very weak, and yet they are very industrious in gathering proper food, and have a strange sagacity to do it in the summer, the proper time: this is so great a piece of wisdom, that we may learn of them to be wise for futurity, ch. 6. 6. When the ravening lions lack, and suffer hunger, the laborious ants have plenty, and know no want.

(2.) The conies, or, as some rather understand it, the Arabian mice, field-mice, weak creatures, and very timorous, yet they have so much wisdom as to make their houses in the rocks, where they are well-guarded, and their feebleness makes them take shelter in those natural fastnesses and fortifications. Sense of our own indigence and weakness should drive us to him that is a Rock higher than we, for shelter and support; there let us make our habitation.

(3.) The locusts; they are little also, and have no king, as the bees have, but they go forth all of them by bands, like an army in battle-array; and, observing such good order among themselves, it is not any inconvenience to them that they have no king. They are called God's great army; (Joel, 2. 25.) for, when he pleases, he musters, he marshals, them, and wages war by them, as he did upon Egypt. They go forth all of them gathered together; so the margin; sense of weakness should engage us to keep together, that we may strengthen the hands of one another.

(4.) The spider; an insect, but as great an instance of industry in our houses as the ants are in the field. Spiders are very ingenious in weaving their webs, with a fineness and exactness, such as no art can pretend to come near; They take hold with their hands, and spin a fine thread out of their own bowels, with a great deal of art; and they are not only in poor men's cottages, but in kings' palaces, notwithstanding all the care that is there taken to destroy them. Providence wonderfully keeps up those kinds of creatures, not only which men provide not for, but which every man's hand is against, and seeks the destruction of. Those that will mind their business, and take hold of it with their hands, shall be in king's palaces; sooner or later, they will get preferment, and may go on with it, notwithstanding the difficulties and discouragements they meet with. If one well-spun web be swept away, it is but making another.

29. There be three things which go well, yea, four are comely in going: 30. A lion which is strongest among beasts, and turneth not away for any; 31. A greyhound; an he-goat also; and a king, against whom there is no rising up. 32. If thou hast done foolishly in lifting up thyself, or if thou hast thought evil, lay thine hand upon thy mouth. 33. Surely the churning of milk bringeth forth butter, and the wringing of the nose bringeth forth blood: so the forcing of wrath bringeth forth strife.

Here is, 1. An enumeration of four things which are majestic and stately in their going, which look great.

(1.) A lion, the king of beasts, because strongest among beasts; among beasts it is strength that gives the pre-eminence, but it is pity that it should do so among men, whose wisdom is their honour, not their strength and force. The lion turns not away, nor alters his pace, for fear of any pursuers, since he knows he is too hard for them. Herein the righteous are bold as a lion, that they turn not away from their duty for fear of any difficulty they meet with in it.

(2.) A grey-hound that is girt in the loins, and fit for running; or, as the margin reads it, a horse, which ought not to be omitted among the creatures that are comely in going, for so he is, especially when he is dressed up in his harness, or trappings.

(3.) A he-goat, the comeliness of whose going is when he goes first, and leads the flock; it is the comeliness of a Christian's going, to go first in a good work, and to lead others in the right way.

(4.) A king, who, when he appears in his majesty, is looked upon with reverence and awe, and all agree that there is no rising up against him; none can compare with him, none can contend with him, whoever does it, it is at his peril. And if there is no rising up against an earthly prince, woe to him then that strives with his Maker. It is intended that we should learn courage and fortitude in all virtuous actions from the lion, and not to turn away from any difficulty we meet with; from the grey-hound we may learn quickness and dispatch; from the he-goat, the care of our family, and those under our charge; and from a king, to have our children in subjection with all gravity; and from them all, to go well, and to order the steps of our conversation, so as that we may not only be safe, but comely, in going.

2. A caution to us to keep our temper at all times, and under all provocations, and to take heed of carrying our resentments too far upon any occasion, especially when there is a king in the case, against whom there is no rising up; when it is a ruler, or one much our superior, that is offended; nay, the rule is always the same.

(1.) We must bridle and suppress our own passion, and take shame to ourselves, whenever we are justly charged with a fault, and not insist upon our own innocency; If we have lifted up ourselves, either in a proud conceit of ourselves, or a peevish opposition to those that are over us, if we have transgressed the laws of our place and station, we have therein done foolishly. Those that magnify themselves over others, or against others, that are haughty and insolent, they do but shame themselves, and betray their own weakness; nay, if we have but thought evil, if we are conscious to ourselves, that we have harboured an ill design in our minds, or it has been suggested to us, we must lay our hand upon our mouth, [1.] We must humble ourselves for what we have done amiss, and even lie in the dust before God, in sorrow for it, as Job did, when he repented of what he had said foolishly; (ch. 40. 4.) I will lay my hand upon my mouth; and as the convicted leper, who put a covering upon his upper lip. If we have done foolishly, we must not stand to it before men, but by silence own our guilt, which will be the best way of appeasing those we have offended. [2.] We must keep the evil thought we have conceived in our minds from breaking out in any evil speeches; Do not give the evil thought an imprimatur—a licence; allow it not to be published, but lay thy hand upon thy mouth; use a holy violence with thyself, if need be, and enjoin thyself silence; as Christ suffered not the evil spirits to speak. It is bad to think ill, but it is much worse to speak it; for that implies a consent to the evil thought, and a willingness to infect others with it.

(2.) We must not irritate the passions of others. Some are so very provoking in their words and conduct, that they even force wrath, they make those about them angry, whether they will or no, and put them into a passion, who are not only not inclined to it, but resolved against it. Now, this forcing of wrath brings forth strife, and where that is, there is confusion and every evil work. As the violent agitation of the cream fetches all the good out of the milk, and the hard wringing of the nose will extort blood from it, so this forcing of wrath wastes both the body and spirits of a man, and robs him of all the good that is in him. Or, as it is in the churning of milk, and the wringing of the nose, that is done by force, which otherwise would not be done; so the spirit is heated by degrees with strong passions, one angry word begets another, and that a third, one passionate debate makes work for another, and so it goes on, till it ends at length in irreconcilable feuds; let nothing, therefore, be said or done with violence, but every thing with softness and calmness.

CHAP. XXXI.

This chapter is added to Solomon's proverbs, some think, because it is of the same author, supposing king Lemuel to be king Solomon; others, only because it is of the same nature, though left in writing by another author, called Lemuel; however it be, it is a prophecy, and therefore given by inspiration and direction of God, which Lemuel was under in the writing of it, and putting it into this form, as his mother was in dictating to him the matter of it. Here is, I. An exhortation to Lemuel, a young prince, to take heed of the sins he would be tempted to, and to do the duties of the place he was called to, v. 1..9. II. The description of a virtuous woman, especially in the relation of a wife, and the mistress of a family, which Lemuel's mother drew up, not as an encomium of herself, though, no doubt, it was her own true picture, but either as an instruction to her daughters, as the foregoing verses were to her son, or as a direction to her son in the choice of a wife; she must be chaste and modest, diligent and frugal, dutiful to her husband, careful of her family, discreet in her discourse, and in the education of her children, and, above all, conscientious in her duty to God; such a one as this, if he can find her, will make him happy, v. 10..31.

1. THE words of king Lemuel, the prophecy that his mother taught him. 2. What, my son? and what, the son of my womb? and what, the son of my vows? 3. Give not thy strength unto women, nor thy ways to that which destroyeth kings. 4. It is not for kings, O Lemuel, it is not for kings to drink wine; nor for princes strong drink: 5. Lest they drink, and forget the law, and pervert the judgment of any of the afflicted. 6. Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts. 7. Let him drink, and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more. 8. Open thy mouth for the dumb in the cause of all such as are appointed to destruction. 9. Open thy mouth, judge righteously, and plead the cause of the poor and needy.

Most interpreters are of opinion that Lemuel is Solomon; the name signifies one that is for God, or devoted to God; and so it agrees well enough with that honourable name which, by divine appointment, was given to Solomon, (2 Sam. 12. 25.) Jedediah, beloved of the Lord. Lemuel is supposed to be a pretty, fond, endearing, name, by which his mother used to call him; and so much did he value himself upon the interest he had in his mother's affections, that he was not ashamed to call himself by it. One would the rather incline to think it is Solomon that here tells us what his mother taught him, because he tells us, (ch. 4. 4.) what his father taught him. But some think, (and the conjecture is not improbable,) that Lemuel was a prince of some neighbouring country, whose mother was a daughter of Israel, perhaps of the house of David, and taught him these good lessons. Note, 1. It is the duty of mothers, as well as fathers, to teach their children what is good, that they may do it, and what is evil, that they may avoid it; when they are young and tender, they are most under the mother's eye, and she has then an opportunity of moulding and fashioning their minds well, which she ought not to let slip. 2. Even kings must be catechised; the greatest of men is less than the least of the ordinances of God. 3. Those that are grown up to maturity should often call to mind, and make mention of, the good instructions they received when they were children, for their own admonition, the edification of others, and the honour of those who were the guides of their youth.

Now, in this mother's (this queen mother's) catechism, observe, I. Her expostulation with the young prince, by which she lays hold of him, claims an interest in him, and awakens his attention to what she was about to say; (v. 2.) "What, my son? What shall I say to thee?" She speaks as one considering what advice to give him, and choosing out words to reason with him; so full of concern is she for his welfare! Or, What is this that thou doest? It seems to be a chiding question. She observed, when he was young, that he was too much inclined to women and wine, and therefore she found it necessary to take him to task, and deal roundly with him. "What, my son? Is this the course of life thou intendest to lead? Have I taught thee no better than thus? I must reprove thee, and reprove thee sharply, and thou must take it well, for,"

1. "Thou art descended from me, thou art the son of my womb, and therefore, what I say comes from the authority and affection of a parent, and cannot be suspected to come from any ill-will; thou art a piece of myself, I bare thee with sorrow, and I expect no other return for all the pains I have taken with thee, and undergone for thee, than this, Be wise and good, and then I am well-paid."

2. "Thou art devoted to my God; thou art the son of my vows, the son I prayed to God to give me, and promised to give back to God, and did so;" (thus Samuel was the son of Hannah's vows;) "thou art the son I have often prayed to God to give his grace to; (Ps. 72. 1.) and shall a child of so many prayers miscarry? And shall all my hopes concerning thee be disappointed?" Our children that by baptism are dedicated to God, for whom, and in whose name, we covenanted with God, may well be called the children of our vows; and as this may be made a good plea with God in our prayers for them, so it may be made a good plea with them in the instructions we give them; we may tell them they are baptized, are the children of our vows, and it is at their peril if they break those bonds in sunder, which, in their infancy, they were solemnly brought under.

II. The caution she gives him against those two destroying sins of uncleanness and drunkenness, which, if he allowed himself in them, would certainly be his ruin.

1. Against uncleanness; (v. 3.) Give not thy strength unto women, unto strange women. He must not be soft and effeminate, nor spend that time in a vain conversation with the ladies, which should be spent in getting knowledge and dispatching business; nor employ that wit which is the strength of the soul in courting and complimenting them, which he should employ about the affairs of his government. "Especially shun all adultery, fornication, and lasciviousness, which waste the strength of the body, and bring into it dangerous diseases. Give not thy ways, thy affections, thy conversation, to that which destroys kings, which has destroyed many, which gave such a shock to the kingdom, even of David himself, in the matter of Uriah. Let the sufferings of others be thy warnings." It lessens the honour of kings, and makes them mean. Are those fit to govern others, that are themselves slaves to their own lusts? It makes them unfit for business, and fills their court with the basest and worst of animals. Kings lie exposed to temptations of this kind, having wherewith both to please the humours, and to bear the charges of the sin, and therefore they ought to double their guard; and if they would preserve their people from the unclean spirit, they must themselves be patterns of purity. Meaneer people may also apply it to themselves. Let none give their strength to that which destroys souls.

2. Against drunkenness, v.4,5. He must not drink wine, or strong drink, to excess; he must never sit to drink as they used to do in the day of their king, when the princes made him sick with bottles of wine, Hos. 7.5. Whatever temptation he might be in from the excellency of the wine, or the charms of the company, he must deny himself, and be strictly sober, considering.

(1.) The indecency of drunkenness in a king; However some may call it a fashionable accomplishment and entertainment, it is not for kings, O Lemuel, it is not for kings, to allow themselves that liberty; it is a disparagement to their dignity, and profanes their crown, by confusing the head that wears it; that which for the time unmans them, does for the time unking them. Shall we say, They are gods? No, they are worse than the beasts that perish. All Christians are made to our God kings and priests, and must apply this to themselves. It is not for Christians, it is not for Christians, to drink to excess, they debase themselves if they do; it ill becomes the heirs of the kingdom, and the spiritual priests, Lev.10.9.

(2.) The ill consequences of it; (v.5.) Lest they drink away their understandings and memories, drink, and forget the law by which they are to govern; and so, instead of doing good with their power, do hurt with it, and pervert or alter the judgment of all the sons of affliction, and, when they should right them, wrong them, and add to their affliction. It is a sad complaint which is made of the priests and prophets, (Isa.28.7.) that they have erred through wine, and through strong drink they are out of the way; and the effect is as bad in kings, who, when they are drunk, or intoxicated with the love of wine, cannot but stumble in judgment. Judges must have clear heads, which those cannot have, who so often make themselves giddy, and incapacitate themselves to judge of the most common things.

III. The counsel she gives him to do good.

1. He must do good with his wealth. Great men must not think that they have their abundance, only that out of it they may make provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts of it, and may the more freely indulge their own genius; no, but that with it they may relieve such as are in distress, v.6,7. "Thou hast wine and strong drink at command; instead of doing thyself hurt with it, do others good with it, let them have it that need it." Those that have wherewithal must not only give bread to the hungry, and water to the thirsty, but they must give strong drink to him that is ready to perish through sickness or pain, and wine to those that are melancholy and of heavy heart; for it was appointed to cheer and revive the spirits, and make glad the heart, (as it does where there is need of it,) not to burthen and oppress the spirits, as it does where there is no need of it. We must deny ourselves in the gratifications of sense, that we may have to spare for the relief of the miseries of others, and be glad to see our superfluities and dainties better bestowed upon those whom they will be a real kindness to, than upon ourselves whom they will be a real injury to. Let those that are ready to perish drink soberly, and it will be a means so to revive their drooping spirits, that they will forget their poverty for the time, and remember their misery no more, and so they will be the better able to bear it. The Jews say, that upon this was grounded the practice of giving a stupifying drink to condemned prisoners when they were going to execution, as they did to our Saviour. But the scope of the place is to shew that wine is a cordial, and therefore to be used for want, and not for wantonness, by those only that need cordials, as Timothy, who is advised to drink a little wine, only for his stomach's sake, and his often infirmities, 1 Tim. 5.23.

2. He must do good with his power, his knowledge, and interest; must administer justice with care, courage, and compassion, v.8,9. (1.) He must himself take cognizance of the causes his subjects have depending in his courts, and inspect what his judges and officers do, that he may support those that do their duty, and lay those aside that neglect it, or are partial. (2.) He must, in all matters that come before him, judge righteously, and, without fear of the face of man, boldly pass sentence according to equity; Open thy mouth; which denotes the liberty of speech that princes and judges ought to use in passing sentence. Some observe, that wise men only open their mouths, for fools have their mouths always open, are full of words. (3.) He must especially look upon himself as obliged to be the patron of oppressed innocency; the inferior magistrates perhaps had not zeal and tenderness enough to plead the cause of the poor and needy, therefore the king himself must interpose and appear as an advocate, [1.] For those that were unjustly charged with capital crimes, as Naboth was; that were appointed to destruction, to gratify the malice either of a particular person, or of a party. It is a case which it well befits a king to appear in, for the preserving of innocent blood. [2.] For those that had actions unjustly brought against them, to defraud them of their right, because they were poor and needy, and unable to defend it, not having wherewithal to fee counsel; in such a case also kings must be advocates for the poor. Especially, [3.] For those that were dumb, and knew not how to speak for themselves, either through weakness or fear, or being over-talked by the prosecutor, or overawed by the court. It is generous to speak for those that cannot speak for themselves, that are absent, or have not words at command, or are timorous. Our law appoints the judge to be of counsel for the prisoner.

10. Who can find a virtuous woman? for her price is far above rubies. 11. The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, so that he shall have no need of spoil. 12. She will do him good and not evil all the days of her life. 13. She seeketh wool, and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands. 14. She is like the merchants' ships; she bringeth her food from afar. 15. She riseth also while it is yet night, and giveth meat to her household, and a portion to her maidens. 16. She considereth a field, and buyeth it: with the fruit of her hands she planteth a vineyard. 17. She girdeth her loins with strength, and strengtheneth her arms. 18. She perceiveth that her merchandise is good: her candle goeth not out by night. 19. She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff. 20. She stretcheth out her hand to the poor; yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy. 21. She is not afraid of the snow for her household: for all her household are clothed with scarlet. 22. She maketh herself coverings of tapestry: her clothing is silk and purple. 23. Her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land. 24. She maketh fine linen, and selleth it; and delivereth girdles unto the merchant. 25. Strength and honour are her clothing; and she shall rejoice in time to come. 26. She openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness. 27. She locketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness. 28. Her children arise up, and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her. 29. Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all. 30. Favour is deceitful, and beauty is vain: but a woman that feareth the LORD, she shall be praised. 31. Give her of the fruit of her hands; and let her own works praise her in the gates.

This description of the virtuous woman is designed to shew what wives the women should make, and what wives the men should choose; it consists of twenty-two verses, each beginning with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet in order, as some of the Psalms; which makes some think it was no part of the lesson which Lemuel's mother taught him, but a poem by itself, written by some other hand, and perhaps had been commonly repeated among the pious Jews, for the ease of which it was made alphabetical. We have the abridgment of it in the New Testament, (1 Tim. 2. 9, 10. 1 Pet. 3. 1. .6.) where the duty prescribed to wives agrees with this description of a good wife; and with good reason is so much stress laid upon it, since it contributes as much as any one thing to the keeping up of religion in families, and the entail of it upon posterity, that the mothers be wise and good; and of what consequence it is to the wealth and outward prosperity of a house, every one is sensible. He that will thrive must ask his wife leave. Here is,

I. A general inquiry after such a one; (v. 10.) where observe, 1. The person inquired after, and that is, a virtuous woman; a woman of strength, so the word is; though the weaker vessel, yet made strong by wisdom and grace, and the fear of God; it is the same word that is used in the character of good judges, (Exod. 18. 21.) that they are able men, men qualified for the business to which they are called, men of truth, fearing God. So it follows, A virtuous woman is a woman of spirit, who has the command of her own spirit, and knows how to manage other people's; one that is pious and industrious, and a help meet for a man. In opposition to this strength, we read of the weakness of the heart of an imperious, whorish, woman, Ezek. 16. 30. A virtuous woman is a woman of resolution, who, having espoused good principles, is firm and steady to them, and will not be frightened with winds and clouds from any part of her duty. 2. The difficulty of meeting with such a one; Who can find her? Which intimates that good women are very scarce; many that seem to be so, do not prove so; he that thought he had found a virtuous woman was deceived; Behold, it was Leah, and not the Rachel he expected. But he that designs to marry ought to seek diligently for such a one, to have this principally in his eye, in all his inquiries, and to take heed that he be not biassed by beauty or gaiety, wealth or parentage, dressing well or dancing well, for all these may be, and yet the woman not be virtuous; and there is many a woman truly virtuous, who yet is not recommended by these advantages. 3. The unspeakable worth of such a one, and the value which he that has such a wife ought to put upon her, shewing it by his thankfulness to God, and his kindness and respect to her, whom he must never think he can do too much for; her price is far above rubies, and all the rich ornaments with which vain women adorn themselves. The more rare such good wives are, the more they are to be valued.

II. A particular description of her, and of her excellent qualifications.

1. She is very industrious to recommend herself to her husband's esteem and affection. Those that are good really, will be good relatively. A good woman, if she be brought into the married state, will be a good wife, and make it her business to please her husband, 1 Cor. 7. 34. Though she is a woman of spirit herself, yet her desire is to her husband, to know his mind, that she may accommodate herself to it, and she is willing that he rule over her.

(1.) She conducts herself so that he may repose an entire confidence in her; in her chastity, which she never gave him the least occasion to suspect, or to entertain any jealousy of; she is not morose and reserved, but modest and grave, and has all the marks of virtue in her countenance and behaviour; her husband knows it, and therefore his heart doth safely trust in her; he is easy, and makes her so. He trusts in her conduct, that she will speak in all companies, and act in all affairs, with prudence and discretion, so as not to occasion him either damage or reproach. He trusts in her fidelity to his interests, and that she will never betray his counsels, or have any interest separate from that of his family. When he goes abroad, to attend the concerns of the public, he can confide in her to order all his affairs at home, as well as if he himself were there. She is a good wife, that is fit to be trusted, and he a good husband, that will leave it to such a wife to manage for him.

(2.) She contributes so much to his content and satisfaction that he shall have no need of spoil; he needs not be griping and scraping abroad, as those must be whose wives are proud and wasteful at home. She manages his affairs so that he is always before-hand, has such plenty of his own, that he is in no temptation to prey upon his neighbours. He thinks himself so happy in her, that he envies not those who have most of the wealth of this world; he needs it not, he has enough, having such a wife. Happy the couple that have such a satisfaction as this in each other!

(3.) She makes it her constant business to do him good, and is afraid of doing any thing, even through inadvertency, that may turn to his prejudice, v. 12. She shews her love to him, not by a foolish fondness, but by prudent endearments, accommodating herself to his temper, and not crossing him, giving him good words, and not bad ones, no, not when he is out of humour; studying to make him easy, to provide what is fit for him both in health and sickness, and attending him with diligence and tenderness when any thing ails him; nor would she, no, not for the world, wilfully do any thing that might be a damage to his person, family, estate, or reputation. And this is her care all the days of her life; not at first only, or now and then, when she is in a good humour, but perpetually; and she is not weary of the good offices she does him; She does him good, not only all the days of his life, but of her own too; if she survive him, still she is doing him good in her care of his children, his estate, and good name, and all the concerns he left behind him. We read of kindness shewed, not only to the living, but to the dead, Ruth, 2. 20.

(4.) She adds to his reputation in the world; (v. 23.) Her husband is known in the gates, known to have a good wife. By his wise counsels, and prudent management of affairs, it appears that he has a discreet companion in his bosom, by conversation with whom he improves himself. By his cheerful countenance and pleasant humour, it appears that he has an agreeable wife at home; for many that have not have their tempers strangely soured by it. Nay, by his appearing clean and neat in his dress, every thing about him decent and handsome, yet not gaudy, one may know he has a good wife at home that takes care of his clothes.

2. She is one that takes pains in the duty of her place, and takes pleasure in it. This part of her character is much enlarged upon here.

(1.) She hates to sit still and do nothing; She eats not the bread of idleness, v. 27. Though she needs not work for her bread, (she has an estate to live upon,) yet she will not eat it in idleness, because she knows that we were none of us sent into this world to be idle, and that when we have nothing to do, the Devil will soon find us something to do, and that it is not fit that those who will not labour should eat. Some eat and drink because they can find themselves nothing else to do; and needless visits must be received with fashionable entertainments; these are eating the bread of idleness, which she has no relish for, for she neither gives, nor receives, idle visits or idle talk.

(2.) She is careful to fill up time that none of that be lost. When day-light is done, she does not then think it time to lay by her work, as those are forced to do whose business lies abroad in the fields, (Ps. 104. 23.) but, her business lying within doors, and her work worth candle-light, with that she lengthens out the day: and her candle goes not out by night, v. 18. It is a mercy to have candle-light to supply the want of day-light, and a duty, having that advantage, to improve it. We say of an elaborate piece, It smells of the lamp.

(3.) She rises early, while it is yet night, (v. 15.) to give her servants their breakfast, that they may be ready to go cheerfully about their work as soon as the day breaks. She is none of those who sit up playing at cards, or dancing, till midnight, till morning, and then lie in bed till noon; no, the virtuous woman loves her business better than her ease or her pleasure, is in care to be found in the way of her duty every hour of the day, and has more true satisfaction in having given meat to her household betimes in the morning, than those can have in the money they have won, much more, in what they have lost, who sat up all night at play. Those that have a family to take care of, should not love their bed too well in a morning.

(4.) She applies herself to the business that is proper for her. It is not in scholar's business, or statesman's business, or husbandman's business, that she employs herself, but in women's business; She seeks wool and flax, where she may have the best of each at the best hand, and cheapest; she has a stock of both by her, and every thing that is necessary to the carrying on both of the woollen and the linen manufacture; (v. 13.) and with this, she does not only set the poor on work, which is a very good office, but does herself work, and work willingly, with her hands; she works with the counsel or delight of her hands, so the word is; she goes about it cheerfully and dexterously; lays not only her hand, but her mind, to it, and goes on in it without weariness in well-doing. She lays her own hands to the spindle, or spinning-wheel, and her hands hold the distaff; (v. 19.) and she does not reckon it either an abridgment of her liberty, or a disparagement to her dignity, or at all inconsistent with her repose. The spindle and the distaff are here mentioned as her honour, while the ornaments of the daughters of Zion are reckoned up to their reproach, Isa. 3. 18, &c.

(5.) She does what she does with all her might, and does not trifle in it; (v. 17.) She girds her loins with strength, and strengthens her arms; she does not employ herself in sitting work only, or in that which is only the nice performance of the fingers; there are works that are scarcely one remove from doing nothing; but, if there be occasion, she will go through with work that requires all the strength she has, which she will use as one that knows it is the way to have more.

3. She is one that makes what she does to turn to a good account by her prudent management of it; she does not toil all night and catch nothing; no, she herself perceives that her merchandise is good; (v. 18.) she is sensible that in all her labour there is profit, and that encourages her to go on in it. She perceives that she can make things herself better and cheaper than she can buy them; she finds by observation what branch of her employment brings in the best returns, and to that she applies herself most closely.

(1.) She brings in provisions of all things necessary and convenient for her family, v. 14. No merchants' ships, no, not Solomon's navy, ever made a more advantageous return than her employments do. Do they bring in foreign commodities with the effects they export? So does she with the fruit of her labours. What her ground does not produce, she can furnish herself with, if she have occasion for it, by exchanging her own goods for it; and so she brings her food from afar. Not that she values things the more for their being far-fetched, but, if they be ever so far off, if she must have them, she knows how to come by them.

(2.) She purchases lands, and enlarges the demesne of the family; (v. 16.) She considers a field, and buys it. She considers what an advantage it will be to the family, and what a good account it will turn to, and therefore she buys it; or rather, though she have ever so much mind to it, she will not buy it, till she has first considered it, whether it be worth her money, whether she can afford to take so much money out of her stock, as must go to purchase it, whether the title be good, whether the ground will answer the character given of it, and whether she has money at command to pay for it. Many have undone themselves by buying without considering; but those who would make advantageous purchases must consider, and then buy. She also plants a vineyard, but it is with the fruit of her hands; she does not take up money, or run into debt, to do it, but she does it with what she can spare out of the gains of her own housewifery. Men should not lay out any thing upon superfluities, till, by the blessing of God upon their industry, they are got before-hand, and can afford it; and then the fruit of the vineyard is likely to be doubly sweet, when it is the fruit of honest industry.

(3.) She furnishes her house well, and has good clothing for herself and her family; (v. 22.) She makes herself coverings of tapestry to hang her rooms, and she may be allowed to use them when they are of her own making; her own clothing is rich and fine, it is silk and purple, according to her place and rank. Though she is not so vain as to spend much time in dressing her, nor makes the putting on of apparel her adorning, nor values herself upon it, yet she has rich clothes, and puts them on well. The senator's robes which her husband wears are of her own spinning, and they look better, and wear better, than any that are bought. She also gets good warm clothing for her children, and her servants' liveries; she needs not fear the cold of the most pinching winter, for she and her family are well-provided with clothes, sufficient to keep out cold, which is the end chiefly to be aimed at in clothing; All her household are clothed in scarlet, strong cloth, and fit for winter, and yet rich, and making a good appearance. They are all double-clothed, so some read it; have change of raiment, a winter-suit, and a summer-suit.

(4.) She trades abroad; she makes more than she and her household have occasion for; and therefore, when she has sufficiently stocked her family, she sells fine linen and girdles to the merchants, (v. 24.) who carry them to Tyre, the mart of the nations, or some other trading city. Those families are likely to thrive that sell more than they buy; as it is well with the kingdom when abundance of its home-manufactures are exported. It is no disgrace to those of the best quality to sell what they can spare, nor to deal in trade, and send ventures by sea.

(5.) She lays up for hereafter; She shall rejoice in time to come, having laid in a good stock for her family, and having good portions for her children. Those that take pains when they are in their prime will have the pleasure and joy of it when they are old, both in reflecting upon it, and in reaping the benefit of it.

4. She takes care of her family, and all the affairs of it, gives meat to her household, (v. 15.) to every one their portion of meat in due season, so that none of her servants have reason to complain of being kept short, or faring hard. She gives also a portion, an allotment of work, as well as meat, to her maidens; they shall each of them know their business, and have their task. She looks well to the ways of her household, (v. 27.) she inspects the manners of all her servants, that she may check what is amiss among them, and oblige them all to behave properly, and do their duty to God and one another, as well as to her, as Job, who put away iniquity far from his tabernacle; and David, who would suffer no wicked thing in his house. She does not intermeddle in the concerns of other people's houses, she thinks it enough for her to look well to her own.

5. She is charitable to the poor, v. 20. She is as intent upon giving as she is upon getting, she often serves the poor with her own hand, and she does it freely, cheerfully, and very liberally, with an outstretched hand. Nor does she relieve her poor neighbours only, and those that are nigh at hand, but she reaches forth her hands to the needy that are at a distance, seeking opportunities to do good and to communicate; which is as good housewifery as any thing she does.

6. She is discreet and obliging in all her discourse; not talkative, censorious, or peevish, as some are, that know how to take pains; no, she opens her mouth with wisdom; when she does speak, it is with a great deal of prudence, and very much to the purpose; you may perceive by every word she says, how much she governs herself by the rules of wisdom. She not only takes prudent measures herself, but gives prudent advice to others; and this, not as assuming the authority of a dictator, but with the affection of a friend, and an obliging air; In her tongue is the law of kindness; all she says is under the government of that law. The law of love and kindness is written in the heart, but it shews itself in the tongue; if we are kindly affectioned one to another, it will appear by affectionate expressions. It is called a law of kindness, because it gives law to others, to all she converses with; her wisdom and kindness together put a commanding power into all she says; they command respect, they command compliance. How forcible are right words! In her tongue is the law of grace, or mercy; so some read it, understanding it of the word and law of God, which she delights to talk of among her children and servants. She is full of pious religious discourse, and manages it prudently; which shews how full her heart is of another world, even when her hands are most busy about this world.

7. That which completes and crowns her character, is, that she fears the Lord, v. 30. With all those good qualities she lacks not that one thing needful; she is truly pious, and, in all she does, is guided and governed by principles of conscience, and a regard to God; this is that which is here preferred far before beauty, that is vain and deceitful; all that are wise and good, account it so, and value neither themselves nor others on it. Beauty recommends none to God, nor is it any certain indication of wisdom and goodness, but it has deceived many a man who has made his choice of a wife by it. There may be an impure deformed soul lodged in a comely and beautiful body; nay, many have been exposed by their beauty to such temptations as have been the ruin of their virtue, their honour, and their precious souls. It is a fading thing at the best, and therefore vain and deceitful; a fit of sickness will stain and sully it in a little time; a thousand accidents may blast this flower in its prime; old age will certainly wither it, and death and the grave consume it; but the fear of God reigning in the heart, is the beauty of the soul; it recommends those that have it, to the favour of God, and is, in his sight, of great price; it will last for ever, and bid defiance to death itself, which consumes the beauty of the body, but consummates the beauty of the soul.

III. The happiness of this virtuous woman.

1. She has the comfort and satisfaction of her virtue in her own mind; (v. 25.) Strength and honour are her clothing, in which she wraps herself, that is, enjoys herself, and in which she appears to the world, and so recommends herself. She enjoys a firmness and constancy of mind, has spirit to bear up under the many crosses and disappointments which even the wise and virtuous must expect to meet with in this world; and this is her clothing, for defence as well as decency. She deals honourably with all, and she has the pleasure of doing so, and shall rejoice in time to come; she shall reflect upon it with comfort when she comes to be old, that she was not idle or useless when she was young. In the day of death it will be a pleasure to her to think that she has lived to some good purpose. Nay, she shall rejoice in an eternity to come, she shall be recompensed for her goodness with fulness of joy and pleasures for evermore.

2. She is a great blessing to her relations, v. 28.

(1.) Her children grow up in her place, and they call her blessed; they give her their good word, they are themselves a commendation to her, and they are ready to give great commendations of her; they pray for her, and bless God that they had such a good mother. It is a debt which they owe her, a part of that honour which the fifth commandment requires to be paid to father and mother; and it is a double honour that is due to a good father and a good mother.

(2.) Her husband thinks himself so happy in her, that he takes all occasions to speak well of her, as one of the best of women. It is no indecency at all, but a laudable instance of conjugal love, for husbands and wives to give one another their due praises.

3. She gets the good word of all her neighbours, as Ruth did, whom all the city of her people knew to be a virtuous woman, Ruth, 3. 11. Virtue will have its praise, Phil. 4. 8. A woman that fears the Lord shall have praise of God, (Rom. 2. 29.) and of men too. It is here shewed,

(1.) That she shall be highly praised; (v. 29.) Many have done virtuously; virtuous women, it seems, are precious jewels, but not such rare jewels as was represented, v. 10.; there have been many, but such a one as this cannot be paralleled; Who can find her equal? She excels them all. Note, Those that are good should aim and covet to excel in virtue. Many daughters, in their father's house, and in the single state, have done virtuously, but a good wife, if she be virtuous, excels them all, and does more good in her place than they can do in theirs. Or, as some explain it, A man cannot have his house so well kept by good daughters as by a good wife.

(2.) That she shall be incontestably praised, without contradiction, v. 31. Some are praised above what is their due, but those that praise her do but give her of the fruit of her hands; they give her that which she has dearly earned, and which is justly owing to her; she is wronged if she have it not.

Note, Those ought to be praised, the fruit of whose hands is praise-worthy. The tree is known by its fruits, and therefore, if the fruit be good, the tree must have our good word. If her children be dutiful and respectful to her, and conduct themselves as they ought, they then give her of the fruit of her hands; she reaps the benefit of all the care she has taken of them, and thinks herself well-paid. Children must thus study to requite their parents, and this is showing piety at home, 1 Tim. 5. 4. But if men be unjust, the thing will speak itself, her own works will praise her in the gates, openly before all the people. [1.] She leaves it to her own works to praise her, and does not court the applause of men. Those are none of the truly virtuous women that love to hear themselves commended. [2.] Her own works will praise her; if her relations and neighbours altogether hold their peace, her good works will proclaim her praise. The widows gave the best encomium of Doreas, when they shewed the coats and garments she had made for the poor, Acts, 9. 39. [3.] The least that can be expected from her neighbours, is, that they should let her own works praise her, and do nothing to hinder them. They that do that which is good, let them have praise of the same, (Rom. 13. 3.) and let not us enviously say, or do, any thing to the diminishing of it, but be provoked by it to a holy emulation. Let none have an ill report from us, that have a good report even of the truth itself. Thus is shut up this looking-glass for ladies, which they are desired to open, and dress themselves by; and if they do so, their adorning will be found to praise, and honour, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ.

Twenty Chapters of the Book of Proverbs, (beginning with ch. 10. and ending with ch. 29.) consisting mostly of entire sentences in each verse, could not well be reduced to proper heads, and the contents of them gathered; I have therefore here put the contents of all these chapters together, which, perhaps, may be of some use to those who desire to see at once all that is said of any one head in these chapters. I take the heads in no method but as they occurred in reading the chapters; some of the verses, perhaps, I have not put under the same heads that another would have put them under, but the most of them fall (I hope) naturally enough to the places I have assigned them.

(1.) OF the comfort, or grief, parents have in their children, according as they are wise or foolish, godly or ungodly, ch. 10. 1.—15. 20.—17. 21, 25.—19. 13, 26.—23. 15, 16, 24, 25.—27. 11.—29. 3.

(2.) Of the world's insufficiency, and religion's sufficiency, to make us happy, ch. 10. 2, 3.—11. 4. and the preference to be therefore given to the gains of virtue, above those of this world, ch. 15. 16, 17.—16. 8, 16.—17. 1.—19. 1.—28. 6, 11.

WITH

Practical Observations,

OF THE BOOK OF

E C C L E S I A S T E S.

We are still among Solomon's happy men, his happy servants, that stood continually before him to hear his wisdom; and they are the choicest of all the dictates of his wisdom, such as were more immediately given by divine inspiration, that are here transmitted to us, not to be heard, as by them, but once, and then liable to be mistaken or forgotten, and by repetition to lose their beauty, but to be read, reviewed, revolved, and had in everlasting remembrance. The account we have of Solomon's apostacy from God, in the latter end of his reign, (1 Kings, 11. 1.) is the tragical part of his story; we may suppose that he spake his Praverbs in the prime of his time, while he kept his integrity, but delivered his Ecclesiastes when he was grown old, (for of the burthens and decays of age he speaks feelingly, ch 12.) and was, by the grace of God, recovered from his backslidings: there he dictated his observations, here he wrote his own experiences; this is what days speak, and wisdom which the multitude of years teaches. The title of the book and the penman we shall meet with in the first verse, and therefore shall here only observe,

- I. That it is a sermon, a sermon in print; the text is, (ch 1. 2.) Vanity of vanities, all is vanity; that is the doctrine too; it is proved at large, by many arguments, and an induction of particulars; and divers objections are answered; and, in the close, we have the use and application of all, by way of exhortation, to remember our Creator, to fear him, and to keep his commandments. There are indeed many things in this book which are dark, and hard to be understood, and some things which men of corrupt minds wrest to their own destruction, for want of distinguishing between Solomon's arguments and the objections of atheists and epicures; but there is enough easy and plain to convince us (if we will admit the conviction) of the vanity of the world, and its utter insufficiency to make us happy, the vileness of sin, and its certain tendency to make us miserable, and of the wisdom of being religious, and the solid comfort and satisfaction that are to be had in doing our duty both to God and man; this should be intended in every sermon, and that is a good sermon by which these points are in any measure gained.
- II. That it is a penitential sermon, as some of David's psalms are penitential psalms; it is a recantation-sermon, in which the preacher sadly laments his own folly and mistake, in promising himself satisfaction in the things of this world, and even in the forbidden pleasures of sense, which now he finds more bitter than death. His fall is a proof of the weakness of man's nature; Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, nor say, "I shall never be such a fool as to do so and so," when Solomon himself, the wisest of men, played the fool so egregiously; nor let the rich man glory in his riches, since Solomon's wealth was so great a snare to him, and did him a great deal more hurt than Job's poverty did him. His recovery is a proof of the power of God's grace, in bringing one back to God that had gone so far from him; it is a proof too of the riches of God's mercy in accepting him, notwithstanding the many aggravations of his sin, pursuant to the promise made to David, that if his children should commit iniquity, they should be corrected, but not abandoned and disinherited, 2 Sam. 7. 14, 15. Let him therefore that thinks he stands, take heed lest he fall; and let him that is fallen, make haste to get up again, and not despair either of assistance or acceptance therein.
- III. That it is a practical, profitable, sermon. Solomon, being brought to repentance, resolves, like his father, to teach transgressors God's way, (Ps. 51. 13.) and to give warning to all to take heed of splitting upon those rocks which had been fatal to him; and these were fruits meet for repentance. The fundamental error of the children of men, and that which is at the bottom of all their departures from God, is the same with that of our first parents, hoping to be as gods, by entertaining themselves with that which seems good for food, pleasant to the eyes, and desirable to make one wise. Now the scope of this book is to shew that this is a great mistake, that our happiness consists not in being as gods to ourselves, to have what we will, and do what we will, but in having Him that made us to be a God to us. The moral philosophers disputed much about man's felicity, or chief good, various opinions they had about it, but Solomon, in this book, determines the question, and assures us, that to fear God and to keep his commandments, is the whole of man. He tried what satisfaction might be found in the wealth of the world, and the pleasures of sense, and at last pronounced all vanity and vexation; yet multitudes will not take his word, but will make the same dangerous experiment, and it proves fatal to them. He, 1. Shews the vanity of those things in which men commonly look for happiness, as human learning and policy, sensual delights, honour and power, riches and great possessions. And then, 2. He prescribes remedies against the vexation of spirit that attends them. Though we cannot cure them of their vanity, we may prevent the trouble they give us, by sitting loose to them, enjoying them comfortably, but laying our expectations low from them, and acquiescing in the will of God concerning us in every event, especially by remembering God in the days of our youth, and continuing in his fear and service all our days, with an eye to the judgment to come.

CHAP. I.

In this chapter, we have, I. The inscription, or title, of the book, v. 1. II. The general doctrine of the vanity of the creature laid down, (v. 2.) and explained, v. 3. III. The proof of this doctrine, taken, 1. From the shortness of human life, and the multitude of births and burials in this life, v. 4. 2. From the inconstant nature, and constant revolutions, of all the creatures, and the perpetual flux and reflux they are in; the sun, wind, and water, v. 5. 7. 3. From the abundant toil man has about them, and the little satisfaction he has in them, v. 8. 4. From the return of the same things again, which shews the end of all perfection, and that the stock is exhausted, v. 9, 10. 5. From the oblivion to which all things are condemned, v. 11. IV. The first instance of the vanity of men's knowledge, and all the parts of learning, especially natural philosophy and politics. Observe, 1. The trial Solomon made of these, v. 12, 13, 16, 17. 2. His judgment of them; that all is vanity, v. 14. For, (1.) There is labour in getting knowledge, v. 13. (2.) There is little good to be done with it, v. 15. (3.) There is no satisfaction in it, v. 18. And if this is vanity and vexation, all other things in this world, being much inferior to it in dignity and worth, must needs be so too. A great scholar cannot be happy, unless he be a true saint.

1. THE words of the Preacher, the son of David, king of Jerusalem. 2. Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity. 3. What profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun?

Here is,

1. An account of the penman of this book; it was Solomon, for no other son of David was king of Jerusalem; but he conceals his name Solomon, peaceable, because by his sin he had brought trouble upon himself and his kingdom, had broken his peace with God, and lost the peace of his conscience, and therefore was no more worthy of that name. Call me not Solomon, call me Marah, for behold, for peace I had great bitterness. But he calls himself,

1. The preacher; which bespeaks his present character. He is Koheleth, which comes from a word which signifies to gather; but it is of a feminine termination, by which, perhaps, Solomon intends to upbraid himself with his effeminacy, which contributed more than any thing to his apostacy; for it was to please his wives that he set up idols, Neh. 13. 26. Or the word Soul must be understood, and so Koheleth is,

(1.) A penitent soul, or one gathered; that had rambled and gone astray like a lost sheep, but was now reduced, gathered in from his wanderings, gathered home to his duty, and come at length to himself; the spirit, that was dissipated after a thousand vanities, is now collected, and made to centre in God. Divine grace can make great sinners great converts, and renew even those to repentance, who, after they had known the way of righteousness, turned aside from it, and heal their backslidings, though it is a difficult case. It is only the penitent soul that God will accept, the heart that is broken, not the head that is bowed down like a bulrush only for a day, David's repentance, not Ahab's. And it is only the gathered soul that is the penitent soul, that comes back from its by-paths, that no longer scatters its way to the strangers, (Jer. 3. 13.) but is united to fear God's name. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth will speak, and therefore we have here the words of the penitent, and those published. If eminent professors of religion fall into gross sin, they are concerned, for the honour of God, and the repairing of the damage they have done to his kingdom, openly to testify their repentance, that the antidote may be administered as extensively as the poison.

(2.) A preaching soul, or one gathering. Being himself gathered to the congregation of saints, out of which he had by his sin thrown himself, and being reconciled to the church, he endeavours to gather others to it, that had gone astray like him, and perhaps were led astray by his example. He that has done any thing to seduce his brother, ought to do all he can to restore him. Perhaps Solomon called together a congregation of his people, as he had done at the dedication of the temple, (1 Kings, 8. 2.) so now at the re-dedicating of himself. In that assembly he presided as the people's mouth to God in prayer, (v. 12.) in this as God's mouth to them in preaching. God by his Spirit made him a preacher, in token of his being reconciled to him; a commission is an implicit pardon. Christ sufficiently signified his forgiving Peter, by committing his lambs and sheep to his trust. Observe, Penitents should be preachers; they that have taken warning themselves to turn and live, should give warning to others not to go on and die. When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren. Preachers must be preaching souls, for that only is likely to reach to the heart that comes from the heart. Paul served God with his spirit in the gospel of his Son, Rom. 1. 9.

2. The son of David. His taking this title intimates, (1.) That he looked upon it as a great honour to be the son of so good a man, and valued himself very much upon it. (2.) That he also looked upon it as a great aggravation of his sin, that he had such a father, who had given him a good education, and put up many a good prayer for him; it cuts him to the heart to think that he should be a blemish and disgrace to the name and family of such a one as David. It aggravated the sin of Jehoiakim, that he was the son of Josiah, Jer. 22. 15. 17. (3.) That his being the son of David encouraged him to repent, and hope for mercy, for David had fallen into sin, by which he should have been warned not to sin, but was not; but David repented, and therein he took example from him, and found mercy as he did. Yet this was not all, he was that son of David concerning whom God had said, that though he would chasten his transgression with the rod, yet he would not break his covenant with him, Ps. 89. 34. Christ, the great Preacher, was the Son of David.

3. King of Jerusalem. This he mentions, (1.) As that which was a very great aggravation of his sin; he was a king. God had done much for him, in raising him to the throne, and yet he had so ill requited him; his dignity made the bad example and influence of his sin the more dangerous, and many would follow his pernicious ways; especially as he was king of Jerusalem, the holy city, where God's temple was, and of his own building too, where the priests, the Lord's ministers, were, and his prophets who had taught him better things. (2.) As that which might give some advantage to what he wrote, for where the word of a king is, there is power. He thought it no disparagement to him, as a king, to be a preacher; but the people would regard him the more as a preacher, because he was a king. If men of honour would lay out themselves to do good, what a great deal of good might they do! Solomon looked as great in the pulpit, preaching the vanity of the world, as in his throne of ivory, judging.

The Chaldee-paraphrase (which, in this book, makes very large additions to the text, or comments upon it, all along) gives this account of Solomon's writing this book; That by the spirit of prophecy he foresaw the revolt of the ten tribes from his son; and, in process of time, the destruction of Jerusalem and the house of the sanctuary, and the captivity of the people; in the foresight of which, he said, Vanity of vanities, all is vanity; and to that he applies many passages in this book.

II. The general scope and design of the book. What is it that this royal preacher has to say? That which he aims at, is, for the making of us truly religious, to take down our esteem of, and expectation from, the things of this world. In order to this, he shews,

1. That they are all vanity, v. 2. This is the proposition he lays down, and undertakes to prove; Vanity of vanities, all is vanity. It was no new text, his father David had more than once spoken to the same purport. The truth itself here asserted, is, that all is vanity; all beside God, and considered as abstract from him; the all of this world; all worldly employments and enjoyments; the all that is in the world; (1 John, 2. 16.) all that which is agreeable to our senses and to our fancies in this present state, which gains pleasure to ourselves, or reputation with others. It is all vanity, not only in the abuse of it, when it is perverted by the sin of man, but even in the use of it. Man, considered with reference to these things, is vanity, (Ps. 39. 5, 6.) and, if there were not another life after this, were made in vain; (Ps. 89. 47.) and those things, considered in reference to man, (whatever they are in themselves,) are vanity. They are impertinent to the soul, foreign, and add nothing to it; they do not answer the end, nor yield any true satisfaction; they are uncertain in their continuance, are fading, and perishing, and passing away, and will certainly deceive and disappoint those that put a confidence in them. Let us not therefore love vanity, (Ps. 4. 2.) nor lift up our souls to it, (Ps. 24. 4.) for we shall but weary ourselves for it, Heb. 2. 13.

It is expressed here very emphatically; not only All is vain, but in the abstract, All is vanity; as if vanity were the proprium quarto modo—property in the fourth mode, of the things of this world, that which enters into the nature of them. They are not only vanity, but vanity of vanities, the vainest vanity, vanity in the highest degree, nothing but vanity, such a vanity as is the cause of a great deal of vanity. And this is redoubled, because the thing is certain and past dispute, it is vanity of vanities. This intimates that the wise man had his own heart fully convinced of, and much affected with, this truth, and that he was very desirous that others should be convinced of it, and affected with it, as he was, but that he found the generality of men very loath to believe it, and consider it; (Job, 33. 14.) it intimates likewise, that we cannot comprehend and express the vanity of this world. But who is it that speaks thus slightly of the world? Is it one that will stand to what he says? Yes, he puts his name to it, saith the preacher. Is it one that was a competent judge? Yes, as much as ever any man was. Many speak contemptuously of the world, because they are hermits, and know it not, or beggars, and have it not; but Solomon knew it, he had dived into nature's depths, (1 Kings, 4. 33.) and he had it, more of it perhaps than ever any man had, his head filled with its notions, and his belly with its hid treasures, (Ps. 17. 14.) and he passes this judgment on it. But did he speak as one having authority? Yes, not only that of a king, but that of a prophet, a preacher; he spake in God's name, and was divinely inspired to say it. But did he not say it in his haste, or in a passion, upon occasion of some particular disappointment? No, he said it deliberately, said it, and proved it, laid it down as a fundamental principle, on which he grounded the necessity of being religious. And, as some think, one main thing he designed, was, to shew that the everlasting throne and kingdom which God had by Nathan promised to David and his seed, must be of another world; for all things in this world are subject to vanity, and therefore have not in them sufficient to answer the extent of that promise. If Solomon find all to be vanity, then the kingdom of the Messiah must come, in which we shall inherit substance.

2. That they are insufficient to make us happy. And for this he appeals to men's consciences; What profit has a man of all the pains he takes? v. 3. Observe here,

(1.) The business of this world described; It is labour, the word signifies both care and toil; it is work that wearies men; there is a constant fatigue in worldly business; it is labour under the sun, that is a phrase peculiar to this book, where we meet with it twenty-eight times. There is a world above the sun, a world which needs not the sun, for the glory of God is its light, where there is work without labour, and with great profit, the work of angels; but he speaks of the work under the sun, the pains of which are great, and the gains little. It is under the sun, under the influence of the sun, by its light and in its heat; as we have the benefit of the light of the day, so we have sometimes the burthen and heat of the day; (Matth. 20. 12.) and therefore in the sweat of our face we eat bread; in the dark and cold grave the weary are at rest.

(2.) The benefit of that business inquired into; What profit has a man of all that labour? Solomon says, (Prov. 14. 23.) In all labour there is profit; and yet here he denies that there is any profit. As to our present condition in the world, it is true that by labour we get that which we call profit; we eat the labour of our hands; but as the wealth of the world is commonly called substance, and yet it is that which is not, (Prov. 23. 5.) so it is called profit, but the question is, Whether it be really so or no? And here he determines that it is not; that it is not a real benefit, that it is not a remaining benefit. In short, the wealth and pleasure of this world, if we had ever so much of them, are not sufficient to make us happy, nor will they be a portion for us. [1.] As to the body, and the life that now is, What profit has a man of all his labour? A man's life consists not in an abundance, Luke, 12. 15. As goods are increased, care about them is increased, and they are increased that eat of them, and a little thing will imbitter all the comfort of them; and then, what profit has a man of all his labour? Early up, and never the nearer. [2.] As to the soul, and the life that is to come, we may much more truly say, What profit has a man of all his labour? All he gets by it will not supply the wants of the soul, nor satisfy its desires, will not atone for the sin of the soul, nor cure its diseases, nor countervail the loss of it; what profit will they be of to the soul in death, in judgment, or in the everlasting state? The fruit of our labour in heavenly things is meat that endures to eternal life, but the fruit of our labour for the world is only meat that perishes.

4. One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever.

5. The sun also ariseth, and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place where he arose. 6. The wind goeth toward the south, and turneth about unto the north; it whirleth about continually, and the wind returneth again according to his circuits. 7. All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again. 8. All things are full of labour; man cannot utter it: the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear filled with hearing.

To prove the vanity of all things under the sun, and their insufficiency to make us happy, Solomon here shews,

1. That the time of our enjoyment of these things is very short, and only while we accomplish as a hireling his day. We continue in the world for but one generation, which is continually passing away, to make room for another, and we are passing with it. Our worldly possessions we very lately had from others, and must very shortly leave to others, and therefore to us they are vanity; they can be no more substantial than that life which is the substratum of them, and that is but a vapour, which appears for a little while, and then vanishes away. While the stream of mankind is continually flowing, how little enjoyment has one drop of that stream of the pleasant banks between which it glides! We may give God the glory of that constant succession of generations, in which the world has hitherto had its existence, and will have to the end of time; admiring his patience in continuing that sinful species, and his power in continuing that dying species. We may be also quickened to do the work of our generation diligently, and serve it faithfully, because it will be over shortly; and, in concern for mankind in general, we should consult the welfare of succeeding generations; but as to our own happiness, let us not expect it within such narrow limits, but in an eternal rest and consistency.

2. That when we leave this world, we leave the earth behind us; that abides for ever where it is, and therefore the things of the earth can stand us in no stead in the future state. It is well for mankind in general, that the earth endures to the end of time, when it and all the works in it shall be burnt up; but what is that to particular persons, when they remove to the world of spirits?

3. That the condition of man is, in this respect, worse than that even of the inferior creatures; The earth abides for ever, but man abides upon the earth but a little while. The sun sets indeed every night, yet it rises again in the morning, as bright and fresh as ever; the winds, though they shift their point, yet in some point or other still they are; the waters that go to the sea above ground, come from it again under ground; but man lies down and rises not, Job, 14. 7. 12.

4. That all things in this world are moveable and mutable, and subject to a continual toil and toss, constant in nothing but inconstancy, still going, never resting; it was but once that the sun stood still; when it is risen, it is hastening to set, and when it is set, hastening to rise again; (v. 5.) the winds are ever and anon shifting, (v. 6.) and the waters in a continual circulation;

v. 7.) it would be of as bad consequence for them to stagnate, as for the blood in the body to do so. And can we expect rest in a world where all things are thus full of labour, (v. 8.) on a sea that is always ebbing and flowing, and her waves continually working and rolling?

5. That though all things are still in motion, yet they are still where they were; The sun parts, as it is in the margin, but it is to the same place; the wind turns till it comes to the same place, and so the waters return to the same place whence they came. Thus man, after all the pains he takes to find satisfaction and happiness in the creature, is but where he was, still as far to seek as ever. Man's mind is as restless in its pursuits as the sun, and wind, and rivers, but never satisfied, never contented; the more it has of the world, the more it would have; and it would be no sooner filled with the streams of outward prosperity, the brooks of honey and butter, (Job, 20. 17.) than the sea is with all the rivers that run into it; it is still as it was, a troubled sea that cannot rest.

6. That all things continue as they were, from the beginning of the creation; (2 Pet. 3. 4.) the earth is where it was, the sun, and winds, and rivers, keep the same course that ever they did, and therefore if they have never yet been sufficient to make a happiness for man, they are never likely to be so, for they can but yield the same comfort that they have yielded: we must therefore look above the sun for satisfaction, and for a new world.

7. That this world is, at the best, a weary land; All is vanity, for all is full of labour; the whole creation is made subject to this vanity, ever since man was sentenced to eat bread in the sweat of his brows. If we survey the whole creation, we shall see all busy; all have enough to do, to mind their own business, none will be a portion or happiness for man; all labour to serve him, but none prove a help-meet for him. Man cannot express how full of labour all things are, can neither number the laborious, nor measure the labours.

8. That our senses are unsatisfied, and the objects of them unsatisfying. He specifies those senses that perform their office with least toil, and are most capable of being pleased; The eye is not satisfied with seeing, but is weary of seeing always the same sight, and covets novelty and variety. The ear is fond, at first, of a pleasant song or tune, but soon nauseates it, and must have another; both are surfeited, but neither satiated, and what was most grateful becomes ungrateful. Curiosity is still inquisitive, because still unsatisfied, and the more it is humoured, the more nice and peevish it grows, crying, Give, give.

9. The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun. 10. Is there any thing whereof it may be said, See, this is new? it hath been already of old time, which was before us. 11. There is no remembrance of former things; neither shall there be any remembrance of things that are to come with those that shall come after.

Two things we are apt to take a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction in, and value ourselves upon, with reference to our business and enjoyments in the world, as if they helped to save them from vanity; Solomon here shews us our mistake in both.

1. The novelty of the invention, that it is such as was never known before. How grateful is it to think that none ever made such advances in knowledge, and such discoveries by it, as we! that none ever made such improvements of an estate or trade, and had the art of enjoying the gains of it, as we have! Their contrivances and compositions are all despised and run down, and we boast of new fashions, new hypotheses, new methods, new expressions, which juggle out the old, and put them down; but this is all a mistake; The thing that is, and shall be, is the same with that which has been; and that which shall be done, will be but the same with that which is done, for there is no new thing under the sun, v. 9. It is repeated, (v. 10.) by way of question, Is there any thing of which it may be said, with wonder, See this is new; there never was the like? It is an appeal to observing men, and a challenge to those that cry up modern learning above that of the ancients. Let them name any thing which they take to be new, and though perhaps we cannot make it to appear, for want of the records of former times, yet we have reason to conclude that it has been already of old time, which was before us. What is there in the kingdom of nature, of which we may say, This is new? The works were finished from the foundation of the world; (Heb. 4. 3.) things which appear new to us, as they do to children, are not so in themselves. The heavens were of old; the earth abides for ever; the powers of nature and the links of natural causes are still the same that ever they were. In the kingdom of Providence, though the course and method of it have not such known and certain rules as that of nature, nor does it go always in the same track, yet, in the general, it is still the same thing over and over again; men's hearts, and the corruptions of them, are still the same; their desires, and pursuits, and complaints, still the same; and what God does in his dealings with men, is according to the scripture, according to the manner, so that it is all repetition. What is surprising to us needs not be so, for there has been the like; the like strange advancements and disappointments; the like strange revolutions and sudden turns, sudden turns of affairs; the miseries of human life have always been much the same, and mankind tread a perpetual round, and, as the sun and wind, are but where they were.

Now the design of this is,

(1.) To shew the folly of the children of men, in affecting things that are new, in imagining that they have discovered such things, and in pleasing and priding themselves in them. We are apt to nauseate old things, and to grow weary of what we have been long used to, as Israel of the manna, and covet, with the Athenians, still to tell and hear of some new thing, and admire this and the other as new, whereas it is all what has been. Tatianus the Assyrian, shewing the Grecians how all the arts, which they valued themselves upon, owed their original to those nations which they counted barbarous, thus reasons with them; "For shame, do not call those things Εὐρήσεις—Inventions, which are but Μιμήσεις—Imitations."

(2.) To take us off from expecting happiness and satisfaction in the creature. Why should we look for it there, where never any yet have found it? What reason have we to think that the world should be any kinder to us than it has been to those that have gone before us; since there is nothing in it that is new, and our predecessors have made as much of it as could be made? Your fathers did eat manna, and yet they are dead. See John, 3. 8. 9.—6. 49.

(3.) To quicken us to secure spiritual and eternal blessings. If we would be entertained with new things, we must acquaint ourselves with the things of God, get a new nature; then old things pass away, and all things become new, 2 Cor. 5. 17. The gospel puts a new song into our mouths. In heaven all is new, (Rev. 21. 5.) all new at first, wholly unlike the present state of things, a new world indeed, (Luke, 20. 35.) and all new to eternity, always fresh, always flourishing. This consideration should make us willing to die, That in this world there is nothing but the same over and over again, and we can expect nothing from it more or better than we have had.

2. The memorableness of the achievement, that it is such as will be known and talked of hereafter. Many think they have found satisfaction enough in this, that their names shall be perpetuated, that posterity will celebrate the actions they have performed, the honours they have won, and the estates they have raised; that their houses shall continue for ever; (Ps. 49. 11.) but herein they deceive themselves. How many former things and persons were there, which in their day looked very great, and made a mighty figure, and yet there is no remembrance of them, they are buried in oblivion! Here and there one person or action that was remarkable, met with a kind historian, and had the good hap to be recorded, when, at the same time, there were others, no less remarkable, that were dropt: and therefore we may conclude, that neither shall there be any remembrance of things to come, but that that which we hope to be remembered by will be either lost or slighted.

12. I the Preacher was king over Israel in Jerusalem. 13. And I gave my heart to seek and search out by wisdom concerning all things that are done under heaven: this sore travail hath God given to the sons of man to be exercised therewith. 14. I have seen all the works that are done under the sun; and, behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit. 15. That which is crooked cannot be made straight: and that which is wanting cannot be numbered. 16. I communed with mine own heart saying, Lo, I am come to great estate, and have gotten more wisdom than all they that have been before me in Jerusalem: yea, my heart had great experience of wisdom and knowledge. 17. And I gave my heart to know wisdom, and to know madness and folly: I perceived that this also is vexation of spirit. 18. For in much wisdom is much grief: and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow.

Solomon, having asserted, in general, that all is vanity, and having given some general proofs of it, now takes the most effectual method to evince the truth of it, 1. By his own experience; he tried them all, and found them vanity. 2. By an induction of particulars; and here he begins with that which bids fairest of all other to be the happiness of a reasonable creature, and that is knowledge and learning; if this be vanity, every thing else must needs be so. Now as to this,

1. Solomon tells us here what trial he had made of it, and that with such advantages, that if true satisfaction could have been found in it, he had found it.

1. His high station gave him an opportunity of improving himself in all parts of learning, and particularly in politics and the conduct of human affairs, v. 12. He that is the preacher of this doctrine was king over Israel, whom all their neighbours admired as a wise and understanding people, Deut. 4. 6. He had his royal seat in Jerusalem, which then deserved, better than Athens ever did, to be called the eye of the world. The heart of a king is unsearchable, he has reaches of his own, and a divine sentence is often in his lips. It is his honour, it is his business, to search out every matter. Solomon's great wealth and honour put him into a rapacity of making his court the centre of learning, and the rendezvous of learned men, of furnishing himself with the best of books, and either conversing or corresponding with all the wise and knowing part of mankind then in being, who made application to him to learn of him, by which he could not but improve himself; for it is in knowledge as it is in trade, all the profit is by barter and exchange; if we have that to say which will instruct others, they will have that to say, which will instruct us. Some observe how slightly Solomon speaks of his dignity and honour. He does not say, I the preacher am king, but I was king, no matter what I am. He speaks of it as a thing past, because worldly honours are transitory.

2. He applied himself to the improvement of these advantages, and the opportunities he had of getting wisdom, which, though ever so great, will not make a man wise, unless he give his mind to it. Solomon gave his heart to seek and search out all things to be known by wisdom, v. 13. He made it his business to acquaint himself with all the things that are done under the sun, that are done by the providence of God, or by the art and prudence of man. He set himself to get all the insight he could, into philosophy and mathematics, into husbandry and trade, merchandise and mechanics, into the history of former ages, and the present state of other kingdoms, their laws, customs, and policies, into men's different tempers, capacities, and projects, and the methods of managing them; he set himself not only to seek, but to search, to pry into, that which is most intricate, and which requires the closest application of mind, and the most vigorous and constant prosecution. Though he was a prince, he made himself a drudge to learning, was not discouraged by its knots, nor took up short of its depths. And this he did, not merely to gratify his own genius, but to qualify himself for the service of God and his generation, and to make an experiment how far the enlargement of the knowledge would go toward the settlement and repose of the mind.

3. He made a very great progress in his studies, wonderfully improved all the parts of learning, and carried his discoveries much further than any that had been before him. He did not condemn learning, as many do, because they cannot conquer it, and will not be at the pains to make themselves masters of it; no, what he aimed at he compassed; he saw all the works that were done under the sun, (v. 14.) works of nature in the upper and lower world, all within this vortex, (to use the modern gibberish,) which has the sun for its centre; works of art, the product of men's wit, in a personal or social capacity. He had as much satisfaction in the success of his searches as ever any man had; he communed with his own heart concerning his attainments in knowledge, with as much pleasure as ever any rich merchant had in taking account of his stock. He could say, "Lo, I have magnified and increased wisdom, have not only gotten more of it myself, but have done more to propagate it and bring it into reputation, than any, than all, that have been before me in Jerusalem." Note, It becomes great men to be studious, and delight themselves most in intellectual pleasures. Where God gives great advantages of getting knowledge, he expects improvements accordingly. It is happy with a people, when their princes and noblemen study to excel others as much in wisdom and useful knowledge, as they do in honour and estate; and they may do that service to the commonwealth of learning, by applying themselves to the studies that are proper for them, which meaner persons cannot do. Solomon must be acknowledged a competent judge of this matter, for he had not only got his head full of notions, but his heart had great experience of wisdom and knowledge, of the power and benefit of it, as well as the amusement and entertainment of it; what he knew he had digested, and knew how to make use of. Wisdom entered into his heart, and so became pleasant to his soul, Prov. 2. 10, 11.—22. 18.

4. He applied his studies especially to that part of learning, which is most serviceable to the conduct of human life, and, consequently, is the most valuable; (v. 17.) "I gave my heart to know the rules and dictates of wisdom, and how I might obtain it; and to know madness and folly, how I might prevent and cure it; to know the snares and insinuations of it, that I might avoid them, and guard against them, and discover its fallacies." So industrious was Solomon to improve himself in knowledge, that he gained instruction both by the wisdom of prudent men, and by the madness of foolish men; by the field of the slothful, as well as of the diligent.

11. He tells us what was the result of this trial, to confirm what he had said, that all is vanity.

1. He found that his searches after knowledge were very toilsome, and a weariness not only to the flesh, but to the mind; (v. 13.) This sore travail, this difficulty that there is in searching after truth, and finding it, God has given to the sons of men, to be afflicted therewith, as a punishment for our first parents coveting forbidden knowledge. As bread for the body, so that for the soul, must be got and eaten in the sweat of our face, whereas both had been had without labour, if Adam had not sinned.

2. He found that the more he saw of the works done under the sun, the more he saw of their vanity; nay, and the sight often occasioned him vexation of spirit; (v. 14.) "I have seen all the works of a world full of business, have observed what the children of men are doing; and, behold, whatever men think of their own works, I see, all is vanity and vexation of spirit." He had before pronounced all vanity, (v.2.) needless and unprofitable, and that which does us no good; here he adds, It is all vezation of spirit, troublesome and prejudicial, and that which does us hurt. It is feeding upon wind; so some read it, Hos. 12. 1. (1.) The works themselves which we see done, are vanity and vezation to those that are employed in them. There is so much care in the contrivance of our worldly business, so much toil in the prosecution of it, and so much trouble in the disappointments we meet with in it, that we may well say, It is vezation of spirit. (2.) The sight of them is vanity and vezation of spirit to the wise observer of them. The more we see of the world, the more we see to make us uneasy, and, with Heraclitus, to look upon all with weeping eyes. Solomon especially perceived that the knowledge of wisdom and folly was vezation of spirit, v. 17. It vexed him to see many that had wisdom not use it, and many that had folly not strive against it. When he knew wisdom, it vexed him to see how far off it stood from the children of men; and when he saw folly, how fast he saw it bound in their hearts.

3. He found that when he had got some knowledge, he could neither gain that satisfaction to himself, nor do that good to others, with it, which he expected, v. 15. It would not avail,

(1.) To redress the many grievances of human life; "After all, I find that that which is crooked will be crooked still, and cannot be made straight." Our knowledge is itself intricate and perplexed, we must go far about, and fetch a great compass, to come at it. Solomon thought to have found out a nearer way to it, but he could not; the paths of learning are as much a labyrinth as ever they were. The minds and manners of men are crooked and perverse. Solomon thought, with his wisdom and power together, to have thoroughly reformed his kingdom, and made that straight which he found crooked; but he was disappointed. All the philosophy and politics in the world will not restore the corrupt nature of man to its primitive rectitude; we find the insufficiency of them, both in others and in ourselves. Learning will not alter men's natural tempers, nor cure them of their sinful distempers; nor will it change the constitution of things in this world; a vale of tears it is, and so it will be, when all is done.

(2.) To make up the many deficiencies in the comfort of human life: That which is wanting there cannot be numbered, or counted out to us, from the treasures of human learning, but what is wanting will still be so; all our enjoyments here, when we have done our utmost to bring them to perfection, are still lame and defective, and it cannot be helped; as they are, so they are like to be. That which is wanting in our knowledge, is so much, that it cannot be numbered. The more we know, the more we see of our own ignorance. Who can understand his errors, his defects?

4. Upon the whole, therefore, he concluded that great scholars do but make themselves great mourners; for in much wisdom is much grief, v. 18. There must be a great deal of pains taken to get it, and a great deal of care not to forget it; the more we know, the more, we see, there is to be known, and, consequently, we perceive with greater clearness that our work is without end, and the more we see of our former mistakes and blunders, which occasions much grief. The more we see of men's different sentiments and opinions, (and that is it which a great deal of our learning is conversant about,) the more at a loss we are, it may be, which is in the right. Those that increase knowledge have so much the more quick and sensible perception of the calamities of this world, and for one discovery they make that is pleasing, perhaps they make ten that are displeasing, and so they increase sorrow. Let us not therefore be driven off from the pursuit of any useful knowledge, but put on patience to break through the sorrow of it; but let us despair of finding true happiness in this knowledge, and expect it only in the knowledge of God, and the careful discharge of our duty to him. He that increases in heavenly wisdom, and in an experimental acquaintance with the principles, powers, and pleasures, of the spiritual and divine life, increases joy, such as will shortly be consummated in everlasting joy.

Solomon having pronounced all vanity, and particularly knowledge and learning, which he was so far from giving himself joy of, that he found the increase of it did but increase his sorrow, in this chapter, he goes on to shew what reason he had to be tired of this world and with what little reason most men are fond of it. I. He shews that there is no true happiness and satisfaction to be had in mirth and pleasure, and the delights of sense, v. 1. 11. II. He re-considers the pretensions of wisdom, and allows it to be excellent and useful, and yet sees it clogged with such diminutions of its worth, that it proves insufficient to make a man happy, v. 12. 16. III. He inquires how far the business and wealth of this world will go toward making men happy, and concludes, from his own experience, that, to those who set their hearts upon it, it is vanity and vexation of spirit, (v. 17. 23.) and that if there be any good in it, it is only to those that sit loose to it, v. 21. 26.

1. I SAID in mine heart, Go to now, I will prove thee with mirth, therefore enjoy pleasure: and, behold, this also is vanity. 2. I said of laughter, It is mad: and of mirth, What doeth it? 3. I sought in mine heart to give myself unto wine, yet acquainting mine heart with wisdom; and to lay hold on folly, till I might see what was that good for the sons of men, which they should do under the heaven all the days of their life. 4. I made me great works; I builded me houses; I planted me vineyards: 5. I made me gardens and orchards, and I planted trees in them of all kind of fruits: 6. I made me pools of water, to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees: 7. I got me servants and maidens, and had servants born in my house; also I had great possessions of great and small cattle above all that were in Jerusalem before me: 8. I gathered me also silver and gold, and the peculiar treasure of kings and of the provinces: I gat me men-singers and women-singers, and the delights of the sons of men, as musical instruments, and that of all sorts. 9. So I was great, and increased more than all that were before me in Jerusalem; also my wisdom remained with me. 10. And whatsoever mine eyes desired I kept not from them, I withheld not my heart from any joy; for my heart rejoiced in all my labour: and this was my portion of all my labour. 11. Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do: and, behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun.

Solomon here, in pursuit of the summum bonum—the felicity of man, adjourns out of his study, his library, his elaboratory, his council-chamber, where he had in vain sought for it, into the park and the play-house, his garden and his summer-house; exchanges the company of the philosophers and grave senators for that of the wits and gallants, and the beaux-esprits, of his court, to try if he could find true satisfaction and happiness among them. Here he takes a great step downward, from the noble pleasures of the intellect to the brutal ones of sense; yet, if he resolve to make a thorough trial, he must knock at this door, because here a great part of mankind imagine they have found that which he was in quest of.

I. He resolved to try what mirth would do, and the pleasures of wit, whether he should be happy if he constantly entertained himself and others with merry stories and jests, banter and drollery; if he should furnish himself with all the pretty ingenious turns and repartees he could invent or pick up, fit to be laughed over, and all the bulls, and blunders, and foolish things, he could hear of, fit to be ridiculed and laughed at, so that he might be always in a merry humour

7. This experiment made; (c. 1.) "Finding that in much wisdom is much grief, and that those who are serious are apt to be melancholy, I said in my heart," (to my heart,) "Go to now, I will prove thee with mirth, I will try if that will give thee satisfaction." Neither the temper of his mind, nor his outward condition, had any thing in them to keep him from being merry, but both agreed, as did all other advantages, to further it, therefore he resolved to take a lease this way, and said, "Enjoy pleasure, and take thy fill of it; cast away care, and resolve to be merry." So a man may be, and yet have none of these fine things which he here got to entertain himself with; many that are poor are very merry; beggars in a barn are so to a proverb. Mirth is the entertainment of the fancy, and though it comes short of the solid delights of the rational powers, yet it is to be preferred before those that are merely carnal and sensual. Some distinguish man from the brutes, not only as animal rationale—a rational animal, but as animal risibile—a risible animal; therefore he that said to his soul, Take thine ease, eat and drink, added, And be merry, for it was in order to that that he would eat and drink. "Try therefore," says Solomon, "to laugh and be happy."

2. The judgment he passed upon this experiment; Behold, this also is vanity, like all the rest, it yields no true satisfaction, v. 2. I said of laughter, It is mad, or, Thou art mad, and therefore I will have nothing to do with thee; and of mirth, (of all sports and recreations, and whatever pretends to be diverting,) What doeth it? or, What doest thou? Innocent mirth, soberly, seasonably, and moderately, used, is a good thing, fits for business, and helps to soften the toils and chagrins of human life; but, when it is excessive and immoderate, it is foolish and fruitless. (1.) It does no good; What doeth it? Cui bono—Of what use is it? It will not avail to quiet a guilty conscience; no, nor to ease a sorrowful spirit; nothing is more ungrateful than singing songs to a heavy heart. It will not satisfy the soul, nor ever yield it true content. It is but a palliative cure to the grievances of this present time. Great laughter commonly ends in a sigh. (2.) It does a great deal of hurt; it is mad, it makes men mad, it transports men into many indecencies, which are a reproach to their reason and religion. They are mad that indulge themselves in it, for it estranges the heart from God and divine things, and insensibly eats out the power of religion. Those that love to be merry forget to be serious, and while they take the timbrel and harp, they say to the Almighty, Depart from us, Job, 21. 12, 14. We may, as Solomon, prove ourselves with mirth, and judge of the state of our souls by this; How do we stand affected to it? Can we be merry and wise? Can we use it as sauce, and not as food? But we need not try, as Solomon did, whether it will make a happiness for us, for, we may take his word for it, It is mad; and What doeth it? Laughter and pleasure (says Sir William Temple) come from very different affections of the mind; for as men have no disposition to laugh at things they are most pleased with, so they are very little pleased with many things they laugh at.

II. Finding himself not happy in that which pleased his fancy, he resolved next to try that which would please the palate, v. 3. Since the knowledge of the creature would not satisfy, he would see what the liberal use of it would do; I sought in my heart to give myself unto wine, to good meat and good drink; many give themselves to these without consulting their hearts at all, not looking any further than merely the gratification of the sensual appetite; but Solomon applied himself to it rationally, and as a man; critically, and only to make an experiment. Observe,

1. He did not allow himself any liberty in the use of the delights of sense till he had tired himself with his severe studies; till his increase of wisdom proved an increase of sorrow, he never thought of giving himself to wine. When we have spent ourselves in doing good, we may then most comfortably refresh ourselves with the gifts of God's bounty. Then the delights of sense are rightly used, when they are used as we use cordials, only when we need them; as Timothy drank wine for his health's sake, 1 Tim. 5. 23. I thought to draw my flesh with wine; so the margin reads it, or to wine. Those that have addicted themselves to drinking did at first put a force upon themselves, they drew their flesh to it, and with it; but they should remember to what miseries they hereby draw themselves.

2. He then looked upon it as folly, and it was with reluctance that he gave himself to it; as St. Paul, when he commended himself, called it a weakness, and desired to be borne with in his foolishness, 2 Cor. 11. 1. He sought to lay hold on folly, to see the utmost that that folly would do toward making men happy; but he had like to have carried the jest (as we say) too far. He resolved that the folly should not take hold of him, not get the mastery of him, but he would lay hold on it, and keep it at a distance; yet he found it too hard for him.

3. He took care at the same time to acquaint himself with wisdom, to manage himself wisely in the use of his pleasures, so that they should not do him any prejudice, nor disfit him to be a competent judge of them. When he drew his flesh with wine, he led his heart with wisdom, so the word is; kept up his pursuits after knowledge, did not make a sot of himself, nor become a slave to his pleasures, but his studies and his feasts were foils to each other, and he tried whether both mixed together would give him that satisfaction which he could not find in either separately. This Solomon proposed to himself, but he found it vanity; for they that think to give themselves to wine, and yet to acquaint their hearts with wisdom, will perhaps deceive themselves as much as they do that think to serve both God and mammon. Wine is a mocker, it is a great cheat, and it will be impossible for any man to say that thus far he will give himself to it, and no further.

4. That which he aimed at, was, not to gratify his appetite, but to find out man's happiness, and this, because it pretended to be so, must be tried among the rest. Observe the description he gives of man's happiness; it is that good for the sons of men, which they should do under the heaven all their days. (1.) That which we are to inquire after is not so much the good we must have, we may leave that to God, but the good we must do, that ought to be our care. Good Master, what good things shall I do? Our happiness consists not in being idle, but in doing aright, in being well employed. If we do that which is good, no doubt we shall have comfort and praise of the same. (2.) It is good to be done under the heaven, while we are here in this world, while it is day, while our doing time lasts; this is our state of work and service, it is in the other world that we must expect the retribution, thither our works will follow us. (3.) It is to be done all the days of our life; the good we are to do we must persevere in the doing of to the end, while our doing time lasts; the number of the days of our life, so it is in the margin; the days of our life are numbered to us by him in whose hand our times are, and they are all to be spent as he directs. But that any man should give himself to wine, in hopes to find out in that the best way of living in this world, was an absurdity which Solomon here, in the reflection, condemns himself for. Is it possible that this should be the good that men should do? No; it is plainly very bad.

III. Perceiving quickly that it was folly to give himself to wine, he next tried the most costly entertainments and amusements of princes and great men. He had a vast income, the revenue of his crown was very great, and he laid it out so as might most please his own humour, and make him look great.

1. He gave himself much to building, both in the city and in the country; and, having been at such vast expense, in the beginning of his reign, to build a house for God, he was the more excusable if afterward he pleased his own fancy in building for himself; he began his work at the right end, (Matth. 6. 33.) not as the people (Hag. 1. 4.) that ceiled their own houses while God's lay waste, and it prospered accordingly. In building, he had the pleasure of employing the poor, and doing good to posterity. We read of Solomon's buildings, (1 Kings, 9. 15. . 19.) and they were all great works, such as became his purse, and spirit, and great dignity. See his mistake; he inquired after the good works he should do, (c. 3.) and, in pursuit of the inquiry, applied himself to great works. Good works indeed are truly great, but many are reputed great works, which are far from being good; wondrous works, which are not gracious, Matth. 7. 22.

2. He took to love a garden, which is to some as bewitching a building; he planted him vineyards, which the soil and climate of the land of Canaan favoured; he made him fine gardens and orchards, (v. 5.) and perhaps the art of gardening was no way inferior then to what it is now; he had not only forests of timber-trees, but trees of all kind of fruit, which he himself had planted; and, if any worldly business would yield a man happiness, surely it must be that which Adam was employed in while he was in innocence.

3. He laid out a great deal of money in water-works, ponds, and canals; not for sport and diversion, but for use, to water the wood that brings forth trees; (v. 6.) he not only planted, but watered, and then left it to God to give the increase. Springs of water are great blessings; (Josh. 15. 19.) but where nature has provided them, art must direct them, to make them serviceable, Prov. 21. 1.

4. He increased his family. When he proposed to himself to do great works, he must employ many hands, and therefore procured servants and maidens, which were bought with his money, and of those he had servants born in his house, v. 7. Thus his retinue was enlarged, and his court appeared more magnificent. See Ezra, 2. 58.

5. He did not neglect country-business, but both entertained and enriched himself with that, and was not diverted from it, either by his studies or by his pleasures. He had large possessions of great and small cattle, herds and flocks, as his father had before him; (1 Chron. 27. 29, 31.) not forgetting that his father, in the beginning, was a keeper of sheep. Let those that deal in cattle neither despise their employment, nor be weary of it, remembering that Solomon puts his having possessions of cattle among his great works and his pleasures.

6. He grew very rich, and was not at all impoverished by his building and gardening, as many are, who, for that reason only, repent it, and call it vanity and vexation. Solomon scattered, and yet increased. He filled his exchequer with silver and gold, which yet did not stagnate there, but were made to circulate through his kingdom, so that he made silver to be in Jerusalem as stones; (1 Kings, 10. 27.) nay, he had the Segullah, the peculiar treasure of hugs, and of the provinces, which was, for richness and rarity, more accounted of than silver and gold. The neighbouring kings, and the distant provinces of his own empire, sent him the richest presents they had, to obtain his favour, and the instructions of his wisdom.

7. He had every thing that was charming and diverting; all sorts of melody and music, vocal and instrumental, men-singers and women-singers, the best voices he could pick up, and all the wind and hand-instruments that were then in use. His father had a genius for music, but it should seem he employed it more to serve his devotion than the son, who made it more his diversion. These are called the delights of the sons of men; for the gratifications of sense are the things that the generality of people set their affections upon, and take the greatest complacency in. The delights of the children of God are of quite another nature, pure, spiritual, and heavenly, and the delights of angels.

8. He enjoyed, more than ever any man did, a composition of rational and sensitive pleasures at the same time. He was, in this respect, great, and increased more than all that were before him, that he was wise amidst a thousand earthly enjoyments. It was strange, and the like was never met with,

(1.) That his pleasures did not debauch his judgment and conscience. In the midst of all these entertainments, his wisdom remained with him, v. 9. In the midst of all these childish delights, he preserved his spirit manly, kept the possession of his own soul, and maintained the dominion of reason over the appetites of sense; such a vast stock of wisdom had he, that it was not wasted and impaired, as any other man's would have been, by this course of life! But let none be emboldened hereby to lay the reins on the neck of their appetites, presuming that they may do that, and yet retain their wisdom, for they have not such a strength of wisdom as Solomon had; nay, and Solomon was deceived; for how did his wisdom remain with him, when he lost his religion so far as to build altars to strange gods, for the humouring of his strange wives?

But thus far his wisdom remained with him, that he was master of his pleasures, and not a slave to them, and kept himself capable of making a judgment of them. He went over into the enemies' country, not as a deserter, but as a spy, to discover the nakedness of their land.

(2.) Yet his judgment and conscience gave no check to his pleasures, nor hindered him from extracting the very quintessence of the delights of sense, v. 10. It might be objected against his judgment in this matter, that, if his wisdom remained with him, he could not take the liberty that was necessary to a full experimental acquaintance with it; "Yea," said he, "I took as great a liberty as any man could take, for whatsoever mine eyes desired, I kept not from them, if it could be compassed by lawful means, though ever so difficult or costly; and as I withheld not any joy from my heart, that I had a mind to, so I withheld not my heart from any joy, but, with a non-obstante—with the full exercise of my wisdom, I had a high gust of my pleasures, relished and enjoyed them as much as ever any Epicure did;" nor was there any thing, either in the circumstances of his condition, or in the temper of his spirit, to sour or imbitter them, or give them any alloy. In short, [1.] He had as much pleasure in his business as ever any man had; My heart rejoiced in all my labour; so that the toil and fatigue of that were no damp to his pleasures. [2.] He had no less profit by his business, he met with no disappointment in it to give him any disturbance; This was my portion of all my labour; he had this added to all the rest of his pleasures, that in them he did not only see, but eat, the labour of his hands; and this was all he had, for indeed it was all he could expect, from his labour. It sweetened his business, that he enjoyed the success of it, and it sweetened his enjoyments, that they were the product of his business; so that, upon the whole, he was certainly as happy as the world could make him.

Lastly, We have, at length, the judgment he deliberately gave of all this, v. 11. When the Creator had made his great works, he reviewed them, and behold, all was very good, every thing pleased him; but when Solomon reviewed all the works that his hands had wrought, with the utmost cost and care, and the labour that he had laboured to do, in order to make himself easy and happy, nothing answered his expectation; behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, he had no satisfaction in it, no advantage by it; there was no profit under the sun, neither by the employments, nor by the enjoyments, of this world.

12. And I turned myself to behold wisdom, and madness, and folly: for what can the man do that cometh after the king? even that which hath been already done. 13. Then I saw that wisdom excelleth folly, as far as light excelleth darkness. 14. The wise man's eyes are in his head, but the fool walketh in darkness: and I myself perceived also that one event happeneth to them all. 15. Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me; and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity. 16. For there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is, in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool.

Solomon having tried what satisfaction was to be had in learning first, and then in the pleasures of sense, and having also put both together, he here compares them one with another, and passes a judgment upon them.

1. He sets himself to consider both wisdom and folly. He had considered these before; (ch. 1. 17.) but, lest it should be thought he was then too quick in passing a judgment upon them, he here turns himself again to behold them, to see if, upon a second view, and second thoughts, he could gain more satisfaction in the search than he had done upon the first. He was sick of his pleasures, and, as nauseating them, he turned from them, that he might again apply himself to speculation; and if, upon this rehearing of the cause, the verdict be still the same, the judgment will surely be decisive; for what can the man do that comes after the king; especially such a king, who had so much of this world to make the experiment upon, and so much wisdom to make it with. The baffled trial needs not be repeated; no man can expect to find more satisfaction in the world than Solomon did, nor to gain a greater insight into the principles of morality; when a man has done what he can, still it is that which has been already done. Let us learn, (1.) Not to indulge ourselves in a fond conceit that we can mend that which has been well done before us; let us esteem others better than ourselves, and think how unfit we are to attempt the improvement of the performances of better heads and hands than our's, and rather own how much we are beholden to them, John, 4. 37, 38. (2.) To acquiesce in Solomon's judgment of the things of this world, and not to think of repeating the trial; for we can never think of having such advantages as he had to make the experiment, nor of being able to make it with equal application of mind, and so little danger to ourselves.

2. He gives the preference to wisdom far before folly; let none mistake him, as if, when he speaks of the vanity of human literature, he designed only to amuse men with a paradox, or were about to write (as a great wit once did) Eucomium moriæ—A panegyric in praise of folly; no, he is maintaining sacred truths, and therefore is careful to guard against being misunderstood. I soon saw (says he) that there is an excellency in wisdom more than in folly, as much as there is in light above darkness. The pleasures of wisdom, though they suffice not to make men happy, yet they vastly transcend the pleasures of wine. Wisdom enlightens the soul with surprising discoveries, and necessary directions for the right government of itself; but sensuality (for that seems to be especially the folly here meant) clouds and eclipses the mind, and is as darkness to it, it puts out men's eyes, makes them to stumble in the way, and wander out of it. Or, though wisdom and knowledge will not make a man happy, (St. Paul shews a more excellent way than gifts, and that is grace,) yet it is much better to have them than to be without them, in respect of our present safety, comfort, and usefulness; for the wise man's eyes are in his head, (v. 14.) where they should be, ready to discover both the dangers that are to be avoided, and the advantages that are to be improved; a wise man has not his reason to seek when he should use it, but looks about him, and is quick-sighted, knows both where to step and where to stop; whereas the fool walks in darkness, and is ever and anon either at a loss, or at a plunge, either bewildered, that he knows not which way to go, or embarrassed, that he cannot go forward. A man that is discreet and considerate has the command of his business, and acts decently and safely, as those that walk in the day; but he that is rash, and ignorant, and sottish, is continually making blunders, running upon one precipice or other, his projects, his bargains, are all foolish, and ruin his affairs. Therefore get wisdom, get understanding.

3. Yet he maintains that, in respect of lasting happiness and satisfaction, the wisdom of this world gives a man very little advantage: for,

(1.) Wise men and fools fare alike. "It is true, the wise man has very much the advantage of the fool, in respect of foresight and insight, and yet the greatest probabilities do so often come short of success, that I myself perceived, by my own experience, that one event happens to them all; (v. 14.) those that are most cautious of their health are as soon sick as those that are most careless of it, and the most suspicious are imposed upon." David had observed that wise men die, and are involved in the same common calamity with the fool and the brutish person, Ps. 49. 12. See ch. 9. 11. Nay, it has of old been observed, that Fortune favours fools, and that half-witted men often thrive most, while the greatest projectors forecast worst for themselves. The same sickness, the same sword, devours wise men and fools.

Solomon applies this mortifying observation to himself, (v. 15.) that, though he was a wise man, he might not glory in his wisdom;

I said to my heart, when it began to be proud or secure, As it happens to the fool, so it happens to me, even to me; for thus emphatically it is expressed in the original; "So, as for me, it happens to me. Am I rich? So is many a Nabal that fares as sumptuously as I do. Is a foolish man sick, does he get a fall? So do I, even I; and neither my wealth nor my wisdom will be my security. And why was I then more wise? Why should I take so much pains to get wisdom, when, as to this life, it will stand me in so little stead? Then I said in my heart that this also is vanity." Some make this a correction of what was said before, like that, (Ps. 77. 10.) "I said, This is my infirmity; it is my folly to think that wise men and fools are upon a level;" but really they seem to be so, in respect of the event, and therefore it is rather a confirmation of what he had before said, That a man may be a profound philosopher and politician, and yet not be a happy man.

(2.) Wise men and fools are forgotten alike; (v. 16.) There is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool. It is promised to the righteous, that they shall be had in everlasting remembrance, and their memory shall be blessed, and they shall shortly shine as the stars; but there is no such promise made concerning the wisdom of this world, that that shall perpetuate men's names, for those names only are perpetuated that are written in heaven, and otherwise the names of this world's wise men are written with those of its fools in the dust. That which now is, in the days to come, shall all be forgotten. What was much talked of in one generation, is, in the next, as if it had never been. New persons and new things jostle out the very remembrance of the old, which in a little time are looked upon with contempt, and at length quite buried in oblivion. Where is the wise? Where is the disputer of this world? 1 Cor. 1. 20. And it is upon this account that he asks, How dies the wise man? As the fool. Between the death of a godly and wicked man there is a great difference, but not between the death of a wise man and a fool; the fool is buried and forgotten; (ch. 8. 10.) and no one remembered the poor man that by his wisdom delivered the city; (ch. 9. 15.) so that to both the grave is a land of forgetfulness; and wise and learned men, when they have been a while there out of sight, grow out of mind, a new generation arises, that knew them not.

17. Therefore I hated life: because the work that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me: for all is vanity and vexation of spirit. 18. Yea, I hated all my labour which I had taken under the sun: because I should leave it unto the man that shall be after me. 19. And who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool? yet shall he have rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured, and wherein I have shewed myself wise under the sun. This is also vanity. 20. Therefore I went about to cause my heart to despair of all the labour which I took under the sun. 21. For there is a man whose labour is in wisdom, and in knowledge, and in equity; yet to a man that hath not laboured therein shall he leave it for his portion. This also is vanity and a great evil. 22. For what hath man of all his labour, and of the vexation of his heart, wherein he hath laboured under the sun? 23. For all his days are sorrows, and his travail grief; yea, his heart taketh not rest in the night. This is also vanity. 24. There is nothing better for a man, than that he should eat and drink, and that he should make his soul enjoy good in his labour. This also I saw, that it was from the hand of God. 25. For who can eat, or who else can hasten hereunto, more than I?

26. For God giveth to a man that is good in his sight wisdom, and knowledge, and joy: but to the sinner he giveth travail, to gather and to heap up, that he may give to him that is good before God. This also is vanity and vexation of spirit.

Business is a thing that wise men have pleasure in; they are in their element when they are in their business, and complain if they be out of business; they may sometimes be tired with their business, but they are not weary of it, nor willing to leave it off: here therefore one would expect to have found the good that men should do, but Solomon tried this too; after a contemplative life, and a voluptuous life, he betook himself to an active life, and found no more satisfaction in it than in the other, still it is all vanity and vexation of spirit; of which he gives an account in these verses. Where observe,

I. What the business was which he made trial of; it was business under the sun, (v. 17. . 20.) about the things of this world, sublunary things, the riches, honours, and pleasures, of this present time; it was the business of a king. There is business above the sun, perpetual business, which is perpetual blessedness: what we do, in conformity to that business, (doing God's will as it is done in heaven, and in pursuance of that blessedness,) will turn to a good account, we shall have no reason to hate that labour, nor to despair of it; but it is labour under the sun, labour for the meat that perishes, (John, 6. 27. Isa. 55. 2.) that Solomon here speaks of with so little satisfaction. It was the better sort of business, not that of the hewers of wood and drawers of water, (it is not so strange if men hate all that labour,) but it was in wisdom, and knowledge, and equity, v. 21. It was rational business, which related to the government of his kingdom and the advancement of its interests. It was labour managed by the dictates of wisdom, of natural and acquired knowledge, and the directions of justice; it was labour at the council-board and in the courts of justice; it was labour wherein he shewed himself wise, (v. 19.) which as much exceeds the labour wherein men only shew themselves strong, as the endowments of the mind, by which we are allied to angels, do those of the body, which we have in common with the brutes. That which many people have in their eye more than any thing else, in the prosecution of their worldly business, is, to shew themselves wise, to get the reputation of ingenious men, and men of sense and application.

II. His falling out with this business; he soon grew weary of it. 1. He hated all his labour, because he did not meet with that satisfaction in it which he expected: after he had had his fine houses, and gardens, and water-works, a while, he began to nauseate them, and look upon them with contempt, as children, who are eager for a toy, and fond of it at first, but, when they have played with it a while, are weary of it, and throw it away, and must have another. This speaks not a gracious hatred of these things, which is our duty, to love them less than God and religion, (Luke, 14. 26.) nor a sinful hatred of them, which is our folly, to be weary of the place God has assigned us and the work of it, but a natural hatred of them, arising from a surfeit upon them, and a sense of disappointment in them. 2. He caused his heart to despair of all his labour; (v. 20.) he took pains to possess himself with a deep sense of the vanity of worldly business, that it would not bring in the advantage and satisfaction he had formerly flattered himself with the hopes of. Our hearts are very loath to quit their expectations of great things from the creature, we must go about, must fetch a compass, in arguing with them, to convince them that there is not that in the things of this world which we are apt to promise ourselves from them. Have we so often bored and sunk into this earth for some rich mine of satisfaction, and found not the least sign or token of it, but been always frustrated in the search, and shall we not at length set our hearts at rest, and despair of ever finding it? 3. He came to that, at length, that he hated life itself, (v. 17.) because it is subject to so many toils and troubles, and a constant series of disappointments. God had given Solomon such largeness of heart, and such vast capacities of mind, that he experienced more than other men of the unsatisfying nature of all the things of this life, and their insufficiency to make him happy. Life itself, that is so precious to a man, and such a blessing to a good man, may become a burthen to a man of business.

III. The reasons of this quarrel with his life and labours. Two things made him weary of them.

1. That his business was so great a toil to himself; the work that he had wrought under the sun was grievous unto him, v. 17. His thoughts and cares about it, and that close and constant application of mind, which was requisite to it, were a burthen and fatigue to him, especially when he grew old. It is the effect of a curse on that we are to work upon. Our business is said to be the work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord had cursed, (Gen. 3. 29.) and of the weakening of the faculties we are to work with, and of the sentence pronounced on us, that in the sweat of our face we must eat bread. Our labour is called the vexation of our heart; (v. 22.) it is to most a force upon themselves, so natural is it to us to love our ease. A man of business is described to be uneasy both in his going out and his coming in, v. 23. (1.) He is deprived of his pleasure by day, for all his days are sorrow, not only sorrowful, but sorrow itself, nay, many sorrows and various; his travail, or labour, all day, is grief. Men of business ever and anon meet with that which vexes them, and is an occasion of anger or sorrow to them. They are apt to fret; the more dealings they have in the world, the oftener they are made to fret. The world is a vale of tears, even to those that have much of it. They that labour are said to be heavy-laden, and are therefore called to come to Christ for rest, Matth. 11. 28. (2.) He is disturbed in his repose by night. When he is overcome with the hurries of the day, and hopes to find relief when he lays his head on his pillow, he is disappointed there; cares hold his eyes waking, or, if he sleep, yet his heart wakes, and that takes no rest in the night. See what fools they are, that make themselves drudges to the world, and do not make God their Rest; night and day they cannot but be uneasy. So that, upon the whole matter, it is all vanity, v. 17. This is vanity in particular, (v. 19, 23.) nay, it is vanity and a great evil, v. 21. It is a great affront to God, and a great injury to themselves, therefore a great evil; it is a vain thing to rise up early and sit up late, in pursuit of this world's goods, which were never designed to be our chief good.

2. That the gains of his business must be all left to others. Prospect of advantage is the spring of action, and the spur of industry; therefore men labour, because they hope to get by it; if the hope fail, the labour flags; and therefore Solomon quarrelled with all the works, the great works, he had made, because they would not be of any lasting advantage to himself.

(1.) He must leave them. He could not, at death, take them away with him, nor any share of them, nor should he return any more to them, (Job, 7. 10.) nor would the remembrance of them do him any good, Luke, 16. 25. But I must leave all to the man that shall be after me, to the generation that comes up in the room of that which is passing away. As there were many before us, who built the houses that we live in, and into whose purchases and labours we have entered, so there shall be many after us, who shall live in the houses that we build, and enjoy the fruit of our purchases and labours. Never was land lost for want of an heir. To a gracious soul this is no uneasiness at all; why should we grudge others their turn in the enjoyments of this world, and not rather be pleased, that, when we are gone, those that come after us shall fare the better for our wisdom and industry? But to a worldly mind, that seeks for its own happiness in the creature, it is a great vexation to think of leaving the beloved self behind, at this uncertainty.

(2.) He must leave them to those that would never have taken so much pains for them, and will thereby excuse himself from taking any pains. He that raised the estate did it by labouring in wisdom, and knowledge, and equity; but he that enjoys it, and spends it, (it may be,) has not laboured therein, (v. 21.) and, more than that, never will; the bee toils to maintain the droue. Nay, it proves a snare to him, it is left him for his portion, which he rests in, and takes up with; and miserable he is in being put off with it for a portion. Whereas if an estate had not come to him thus easily, who knows but he might have been both industrious and religious? Yet we ought not to perplex ourselves about this, since it may prove otherwise, that what is well-got may come to one that will use it well, and do good with it.

(3.) He knows not whom he must leave it to, (for God makes heirs,) or, at least, what he will prove to whom he leaves it, whether a wise man or a fool, a wise man that will make it more, or a fool that will bring it to nothing; yet he shall have rule over all my labour, and foolishly undo that which his father wisely did. It is probable that Solomon wrote this very feelingly, being afraid what Rehoboam would prove. St. Jerom, in his commentary on this passage, applies this to the good books which Solomon wrote, in which he had shewn himself wise, but he knew not into whose hands they would fall, perhaps into the hands of a fool, who, according to the perverseness of his heart, makes a bad use of what was well-written. So that, upon the whole matter, he asks, (v. 22.) What has man of all his labour? What has he to himself, and to his own use? What has he that will go with him into another world?

IV. The best use which is therefore to be made of the wealth of this world; and that is, to use it cheerfully, to take the comfort of it, and do good with it. With this he concludes the chapter, v. 24..26. There is no true happiness to be found in these things; they are vanity, and if happiness be expected from them, the disappointment will be vexation of spirit; but he will put us in a way to make the best of them, and to avoid the inconveniencies he had observed. 1. We must not over-toil ourselves, so as, in pursuit of more, to rob ourselves of the comfort of what we have. 2. We must not over-board for hereafter, nor lose our own enjoyment of what we have, to lay it up for those that shall come after us, but serve ourselves out of it first. Observe,

(1.) What that good is which is here recommended to us; and which is the utmost pleasure and profit we can expect or extract from the business and profit of this world, and the furthest we can go to rescue it from its vanity, and the vexation that is in it.

[1.] We must do our duty with them, and be more in care how to use an estate well, for the ends for which we were intrusted with it, than how to raise or increase an estate. This is intimated v. 26. where those only are said to have the comfort of this life, who are good in God's sight; and again, good before God, truly good, as Noah, whom God saw righteous before him. We must set God always before us, and give diligence in every thing to approve ourselves to him. The Chaldee-paraphrase says, A man should make his soul to enjoy good by keeping the commandments of God, and walking in the ways that are right before him; and (v. 25.) by studying the words of the law, and being in care about the day of the great judgment that is to come.

[2.] We must take the comfort of them. Those things will not make a happiness for the soul; all the good we can have out of them is for the body, and if we make use of them for the comfortable support of that, so that it may be fit to serve the soul, and able to keep pace with it in the service of God, then they turn to a good account. There is therefore nothing better for a man, as to these things, than to allow himself a sober cheerful use of them, according as his rank and condition are, to have meat and drink of them for himself, his family, his friends, and so delight his senses, and make his soul enjoy good, all the good that is to had out of them; do not lose that, in pursuit of that good, which is not to be had out of them. But observe, He would not have us to give up business, and take our ease, that we may eat and drink; no, we must enjoy good in our labour; we must use these things, not to excuse us from, but to make us diligent and cheerful in, our worldly business.

[3.] We must herein acknowledge God, we must see that it is from the hand of God; First, The good things themselves that we enjoy, are so, not only the products of his creating power, but the gifts of his providential bounty to us. And then they are truly pleasant to us, when we take them from the hand of God as a Father, when we eye his wisdom giving us that which is fittest for us, and acquiesce in it, and taste his love and goodness, relish them, and are thankful for them. Secondly, A heart to enjoy them is so; this is the gift of God's grace. Unless he gives us wisdom to make a right use of what he has, in his providence, bestowed upon us, and, withal, peace of conscience, that we may discern God's favour in the world's smiles, we cannot make our souls enjoy any good in them.

(2.) Why we should have this in our eye, in the management of ourselves as to this world, and look up to God for it.

[1.] Because Solomon himself, with all his possessions, could aim at no more, and desire no better; (v. 25.) "Who can hasten to this more than I?" This is that which I was ambitious of, I wished for no more, and those that have but little, in comparison with what I have, may attain to this, to be content with what they have, and enjoy the good of it." Yet Solomon could not obtain it by his own wisdom, without the special grace of God, and therefore directs us to expect it from the hand of God, and pray to him for it.

[2.] Because riches are a blessing, or a curse, to a man, according as he has, or has not, a heart to make good use of them.

First, God makes them a reward to a good man, if with them he give him wisdom, and knowledge, and joy, to enjoy them cheerfully himself, and to communicate them charitably to others. To those who are good in God's sight, who are of a good spirit, honest and sincere, pay a deference to their God, and have a tender concern for all mankind, God will give wisdom and knowledge in this world, and joy with the righteous in the world to come; so the Chaldee. Or, he will give that wisdom and knowledge in things natural, moral, political, and divine, which will be a constant joy and pleasure to them.

Secondly, He makes them a punishment to a bad man, if he denies him a heart to take the comfort of them, for they do but tantalize him, and tyrannize over him; To the sinner God gives travail, by leaving him to himself and his own foolish counsels, to gather and to heap up that which, as to himself, will not only burthen him like thick clay, (Hab. 2. 6.) but be a witness against him, and eat his flesh as it were fire; (Jam. 5. 3.) while God designs, by an overruling providence, to give it to him that is good before him; for the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just, and gathered for him that will pity the poor. Note, 1. Godliness, with contentment, is great gain; and those only have true joy that are good in God's sight, and that have it from him, and in him. 2. Ungodliness is commonly punished with discontent and an insatiable covetousness, which are sins that are their own punishment. 3. When God gives abundance to wicked men, it is with design to force them to a resignation in favour of his own children, when they are of age, and ready for it; as the Canaanites kept possession of the good land till the time appointed for Israel's entering upon it. Lastly, The burthen of the song is still the same; This is also vanity and vexation of spirit. It is vanity, at the best, even to the good man; when he has all that the sinner has scraped together, it will not make him happy without something else; but it is vexation of spirit to the sinner to see what he had laid up, enjoyed by him that is good in God's sight, and therefore evil in his. So that, take it which way you will, the conclusion is firm, All is vanity, and vexation of spirit.

CHAP. III.

Solomon having shewed the vanity of studies, pleasures, and business, and made it to appear that happiness is not to be found in the schools of the learned, in the gardens of Epicurus, or upon the exchange, he proceeds, in this chapter, further to prove his doctrine, and the inference he had drawn from it; That therefore we should cheerfully content ourselves with, and make use of, what God has given us, by shewing, I. The mutability of all human affairs, r. 1..10. II. The immutability of the divine counsels concerning them, and the unsearchableness of those counsels, v. 11..15. III. The vanity of worldly honour and power, which are abused for the support of oppression and persecution, if men be not governed by the fear of God in the use of it, v. 16. For a check to proud oppressors, and to shew them their vanity, he reminds them, 1. That they will be called to account for it in the other world, v. 17. 2. That their condition, in reference to this world, (for of that he speaks,) is no better than that of the brutes, v. 18..21. And therefore he concludes, that it is our wisdom to make use of what power we have, for our own comfort, and not to oppress others with it.

1. TO every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven:
 2. A time to be born, and a time to die; a time to plant, and a time to pluck up that which is planted; 3. A time to kill, and a time to heal; a time to break down, and a time to build up; 4. A time to weep, and a time to laugh; a time to mourn, and a time to dance; 5. A time to cast away stones, and a time to gather stones together; a time to embrace, and a time to refrain from embracing; 6. A time to get, and a time to lose; a time to keep, and a time to cast away; 7. A time to rend, and a time to sew; a time to keep silence, and a time to speak; 8. A time to love, and a time to hate; a time of war, and a time of peace. 9. What profit hath he that worketh in that wherein he laboureth? 10. I have seen the travail, which God hath given to the sons of men, to be exercised in it.

The scope of these verses, is, to shew,

1. That we live in a world of changes. That the several events of time, and conditions of human life, are vastly different from one another, and yet occur promiscuously, and we are continually passing and re-passing between them; as in the revolutions of every day and every year. In the wheel of nature, (Jam. 3. 6.) sometimes one spoke is uppermost, and by and by the contrary; there is a constant ebbing and flowing, waxing and waning; from one extreme to the other does the fashion of this world change, ever did, and ever will.

2. That every change concerning us, and the time and season of it, is unalterably fixed and determined by a Supreme Power; and we must take things as they come, for it is not in our power to change what is appointed for us. And this comes in here as a reason why, when we are in prosperity, we should be easy, and yet not secure; not secure, because we live in a world of changes, and therefore have no reason to say, To-morrow shall be as this day; the lowest vallies join to the highest mountains; and yet to be easy, and as he had advised, (ch. 2. 24.) to enjoy the good of our labour, in a humble dependence upon God and his providence, neither lifted up with hopes, nor cast down with fears, but with evenness of mind expecting every event. Here we have,

I. A general proposition laid down, To every thing there is a season, &c. 1. Those things which seem most contrary the one to the other, will, in the revolution of affairs, each take their turn, and come into play. The day will give place to the night, and the night again to the day. Is it summer? It will be winter. Is it winter? Stay a while, and it will be summer. Every purpose has its time. The clearest sky will be clouded, Post gaudia luctus—Joy succeeds sorrow; and the most cloudy sky will clear up; Post nubila Phœbus—The sun will burst from behind the cloud. 2. Those things which to us seem most casual and contingent, are, in the counsel and foreknowledge of God, punctually determined, and the very hour of them fixed, which can neither be anticipated nor adjourned a moment.

II. The proof and illustration of it by the induction of particulars, twenty-eight in number, according to the days of the moon's revolution, which is always increasing or decreasing between its full and change; some of these changes are purely the act of God, others depend more upon the will of man, but all are determined by the divine counsel. Every thing under heaven is thus changeable, but in heaven there is an unchangeable state, and an unchangeable counsel, concerning these things.

1. There is a time to be born, and a time to die; these are determined by the divine counsel, and, as we were born, so we must die, at the time appointed, Acts, 17. 26. Some observe that here is a time to be born, and a time to die, but no time to live; that is so short, that it is not worth mentioning; as soon as we are born, we begin to die. But as there is a time to be born, and a time to die, so there will be a time to rise again, a set time when they that lie in the grave shall be remembered, Job, 14. 13.

2. A time for God to plant a nation, as that of Israel in Canaan, and, in order to that, to pluck up the seven nations that were planted there, to make room for them; and at length there was a time when God spake concerning Israel too, to pluck up and to destroy, when the measure of their iniquity was full, Jer. 18. 7, 9. There is a time for men to plant, a time of the year, a time of their lives, but when that which was planted is grown fruitless and useless, it is time to pluck it up.

3. A time to kill, when the judgments of God are abroad in a land, and lay all waste; but when he returns in ways of mercy, then is a time to heal what he has torn, (Hos. 6. 1, 2.) to comfort a people after the time that he has afflicted them, Ps. 90. 15. There is a time when it is the wisdom of rulers to use severe methods, but there is a time when it is as much their wisdom to take a more gentle course, and to apply themselves to lenitives, not corrosives.

4. A time to break down a family, an estate, a kingdom, when it has ripened itself for destruction; but God will find a time, if they return and repent, to rebuild what he has broken down; there is a time, a set time, for the Lord to build up Zion, Ps. 102. 13, 16. There is a time for men to break up house, and break off trade, and so to break down, which they that are busy building up both must expect and prepare for.

5. A time when God's providence calls to weep and mourn, and when man's wisdom and grace will comply with the call, and will weep and mourn, as in times of common calamity and danger, and then it is very absurd to laugh, and dance, and make merry; (Isa. 22. 12, 13. Ezek. 21. 10.) but then, on the other hand, there is a time when God calls to cheerfulness, a time to laugh and dance, and then he expects we should serve him with joyfulness and gladness of heart. Observe, The time of mourning and weeping is put first, before that of laughter and dancing, for we must first sow in tears, and then reap in joy.

6. A time to cast away stones, by breaking down and demolishing fortifications, when God gives peace in the borders, and there is no more occasion for them; but there is a time to gather stones together, for the making of strong holds, v. 5. A time for old towers to fall, as that in Siloam, (Luke, 13. 4.) and for the temple itself to be so ruined, as that not one stone should be left upon another; but also a time for towers and trophies too to be erected, when national affairs prosper.

7. A time to embrace a friend, when we find him faithful, but a time to refrain from embracing, when we find he is unfair or unfaithful, and that we have cause to suspect him; it is then our prudence to be shy, and keep at a distance. It is commonly applied to conjugal embraces, and explained by 1 Cor. 7. 3. . 5. Joel, 2. 16.

8. A time to get, get money, get preferment, get good bargains and a good interest, when opportunity smiles; a time when a wise man will seek, (so the word is,) when he is setting out in the world, and has a growing family, when he is in his prime, when he prospers, and has a run of business, then it is time for him to be busy, and make hay when the sun shines. There is a time to get wisdom, and knowledge, and grace, when a man has a price put into his hand; but then let him expect there will come a time to spend, when all he has will be little enough to serve his turn. Nay, there will come a time to lose, when what has been got fast will be scattered as fast, and cannot be held fast.

9. A time to keep, when we have use for what we have got, and can keep it without running the hazard of a good conscience; but there may come a time to cast away, when love to God may oblige us to cast away what we have, because we must deny Christ, and wrong our consciences, if we keep it, (Matth. 10. 37, 38.) and rather to make shipwreck of all than of the faith; nay, when love to ourselves may oblige us to cast it away, when it is for the saving of our lives, as it was when Jonah's mariners heaved their cargo into the sea.

10. A time to rend the garments, as upon occasion of some great grief, and a time to sew them again, in token that the grief is over. A time to undo what we have done, and a time to do again what we have undone. Jerom applies it to the rending of the Jewish church, and the sewing and making up of the gospel church thereupon.

11. A time when it becomes us, and is our wisdom and duty, to keep silence, when it is an evil time, (Amos, 5. 13.) when our speaking would be the casting of pearl before swine, or when we are in danger of speaking amiss; (Ps. 39. 2.) but there is also a time to speak for the glory of God and the edification of others, when silence would be the betraying of a righteous cause, and when with the mouth confession is to be made to salvation; and it is a great part of Christian prudence to know when to speak and when to hold our peace.

12. A time to love, and to show ourselves friendly, to be free and cheerful, and it is a pleasant time; but there may come a time to hate, when we shall see cause to break off all familiarity with some that we have been fond of, and to be upon the reserve, as having found reason for a suspicion, which love is loath to admit.

Lastly, A time of war, when God draws the sword for judgment, and gives it commission to devour; when men draw the sword for justice and the maintaining of their rights; when there is in the nations a disposition to war; but we may hope for a time of peace, when the sword of the Lord shall be sheathed, and he shall make wars to cease, (Ps. 46. 9.) when the end of the war is obtained, and when there is on all sides a disposition to peace. War shall not last always, nor is there any peace to be called lasting, on this side the everlasting peace. Thus in all these changes God has set the one over-against the other, that we may rejoice as though we rejoiced not, and weep as though we wept not.

III. The inferences drawn from this observation. If our present state be subject to such vicissitude,

1. Then we must not expect our portion in it, for the good things of it are of no certainty, no continuance; (v. 9.) What profit has he that works? What can a man promise himself from planting and building, when that which he thinks is brought to perfection may so soon, and will so surely, be plucked up and broken down? All our pains and care will not alter either the mutable nature of the things themselves, or the immutable counsel of God concerning them.

2. Then we must look upon ourselves as upon our probation in it. There is indeed no profit in that wherein we labour; the thing itself, when we have it, will do us little good; but if we make a right use of the disposals of Providence about it, there will be profit in that; (v. 10.) I have seen the travail which God has given to the sons of men, not to make up a happiness by it, but to be exercised in it, to have various graces exercised by the variety of events, to have their dependence upon God tried by every change, and to be trained up to it, and taught both how to want and how to abound, Phil. 4. 12. Note, (1.) There is a great deal of toil and trouble to be seen among the children of men; labour and sorrow fill the world. (2.) This toil and this trouble are what God has allotted us; he never intended this world for our rest, and therefore never appointed us to take our ease in it. (3.) To many it proves a gift; God gives it men, as the physician gives a medicine to his patient, to do him good. This travail is given us, to make us weary of the world, and desirous of the remaining rest. (4.) It is given us, that we may be kept in action, and may always have something to do; for we were none of us sent into the world to be idle. Every change cuts us out some new work, which we should be more solicitous about than about the event.

11. He hath made every thing beautiful in his time: also he hath set the world in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end. 12. I know that there is no good in them, but for a man to rejoice, and to do good in his life. 13. And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy the good of all his labour, it is the gift of God. 14. I know that, whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever: nothing can be put to it, nor any thing taken from it: and God doeth it, that men should fear before him. 15. That which hath been is now; and that which is to be hath already been; and God requireth that which is past.

We have seen what changes there are in the world, and must not expect to find the world more sure to us than it has been to others. Now here he shews the hand of God in all those changes; it is he that has made every creature to be that to us that it is, and therefore we must have our eye always up unto him.

1. We must make the best of that which is, and must believe it best for the present, and accomodate ourselves to it; He has made every thing very beautiful in his time, (v. 11.) and, therefore, while its time lasts, we must be reconciled to it; nay, we must please ourselves with the beauty of it. Note, (1.) Every thing is as God has made it; it is really as he appointed it to be, not as it appears to us. (2.) That which to us seems most unpleasant, in its proper time, is altogether becoming. Cold is as becoming in winter as heat in summer; and the night, in its turn, is a black beauty, as the day, in its turn, is a bright one. (3.) There is a wonderful harmony in the Divine Providence, and all its disposals; so that the events of it, when they come to be considered in their relations and tendencies, together with the seasons of them, will appear very beautiful to the glory of God, and the comfort of those that trust in him. Though we see not the complete beauty of Providence, yet we shall see it, and a glorious sight it will be, when the mystery of God shall be finished; then every thing shall appear to have been done in the most proper time, and it will be the wonder of eternity, Deut. 32. 4.

2. We must wait with patience for the full discovery of that which to us seems intricate and perplexed, acknowledging that we cannot find out the work that God makes from the beginning to the end, and therefore must judge nothing before the time. We are to believe that God has made all beautiful, every thing is done well, as in creation, so in providence, and we shall see it when the end comes, but till then we are incompetent judges of it. While the picture is in drawing, and the house in building, we see not the beauty of either, but when the artist has put his last hand to them, and given them their finishing strokes, then all appears very good. We see but the middle of God's works, not from the beginning of them, then we should see how admirably the plan was laid in the divine counsels, nor to the end of them, which crowns the action, then we should see the product to be glorious; but we must wait till the veil be rent, and not arraign God's proceedings, nor pretend to pass a judgment on them. Secret things belong not to us.

Those words, He has set the world in their hearts, are differently understood. (1.) Some make them to be a reason why we may know more of God's work than we do; so Mr. Pemble, "God has not left himself without witness of his righteous, equal, and beautiful ordering of things, but has set it forth to be observed in the book of the world, and this he has set in men's hearts, given man a large desire, and a power, in good measure, to comprehend and understand the history of nature, with the course of human affairs, so that if men did but give themselves to the exact observation of things, they might, in most of them, perceive an admirable order and contrivance." (2.) Others make them to be a reason why we do not know so much of God's works as we might; so Bishop Reynolds; "We have the world so much in our hearts, are so taken up with thoughts and cares of worldly things, and are so exercised in our travail concerning them, that we have neither time nor spirit to eye God's hand in them." The world has not only gained possession of the heart, but has formed prejudices there against the beauty of God's works.

3. We must be pleased with our lot in this world, and cheerfully acquiesce in the will of God concerning us, and accommodate ourselves to it. There is no certain, lasting, good in these things; what good there is in them, we are here told, v. 12, 13. We must make a good use of them,

(1.) For the benefit of others. All the good there is in them, is to do good, with them, to our families, to our neighbours, to the poor, to the public, to its civil and religious interests. What have we our beings, capacities, and estates, for, but to be some way serviceable to our generation? We mistake, if we think we were born for ourselves; no, it is our business to do good, it is in that that there is the truest pleasure, and what is so laid out, is best laid up, and will turn to the best account. Observe, It is to do good in this life, which is short and uncertain; we have but a little time to be doing good in, and therefore had need to redeem time. It is in this life, where we are in a state of trial and probation for another life. Every man's life is his opportunity of doing that which will make for him in eternity.

(2.) For our own comfort. Let us make ourselves easy, rejoice, and enjoy the good of our labour, as it is the gift of God, and so enjoy God in it, and taste his love, return him thanks, and make him the Centre of our joy; eat and drink to his glory, and serve him with joyfulness of heart in the abundance of all things. If all things in this world be so uncertain, it is a foolish thing for men sordidly to spare for the present, that they may hoard up all for hereafter; it is better to live cheerfully and usefully upon what we have, and let to-morrow take thought for the things of itself. Grace and wisdom to do this is the gift of God, and it is a good gift, which crowns the gifts of his providential bounty.

4. We must be entirely satisfied in all the disposals of the Divine Providence, both as to personal and public concerns, and bring our minds to them, because God, in all, performs the thing that is appointed for us, acts according to the counsel of his will; and we are here told,

(1.) That that counsel cannot be altered, and therefore it is our wisdom to make a virtue of necessity, by submitting to it. It must be as God wills; I know (and every one knows it, that knows any thing of God) that whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever, v. 14. He is in one mind, and who can turn him? His measures are never broken, nor is he ever put upon new counsels, but what he has purposed shall be effected, and all the world cannot defeat or disannul it. It behoves us therefore to say, "Let it be as God wills," for how cross soever it may be to our designs and interests, God's will is his wisdom.

(2.) That that counsel needs not to be altered, for there is nothing amiss in it, nothing that can be amended. If we could see it altogether at one view, we should see it so perfect, that nothing can be put to it, for there is no deficiency in it, nor any thing taken from it, for there is nothing in it unnecessary, or that can be spared. Like the word of God, the works of God are each perfect in their kind, and it is presumption for us either to add to them, or to diminish from them, Deut. 4. 2. It is therefore as much our interest as our duty, to bring our wills to the will of God.

5. We must study to answer God's end in all his providences, which is, in general, to make us religious. God doeth all, that men should fear before him, to convince them that there is a God above them, that has a sovereign dominion over them, at whose disposal they are, and all their ways, and in whose hands their times are, and all events concerning them; and that therefore they ought to have their eyes ever toward him, to worship and adore him, to acknowledge him in all their ways, to be careful in every thing to please him, and afraid of offending him in any thing. God thus changes his disposals, and yet is unchangeable in his counsels, not to perplex us, much less to drive us to despair, but to teach us our duty to him, and engage us to do it. That which God designs in the government of the world, is, the support and advancement of religion among men.

6. Whatever changes we see or feel in this world, we must acknowledge the inviolable steadiness of God's government. The sun rises and sets, the moon increases and decreases, and yet both are where they were, and their revolutions are in the same method from the beginning, according to the ordinances of heaven; so it is with the events of Providence; (v. 15.) That which has been, is now. God has not of late begun to use this method; no, things were always as mutable and uncertain as they are now, and so they will be; that which is to be has already been; and therefore we speak inconsiderately, when we say, "Surely the world was never so bad as it is now," or, "None ever met with such disappointments as we meet with," or, "The times will never mend;" they may mend with us, and, after a time to mourn, there may come a time to rejoice, but that will still be liable to the common character, to the common fate. The world, as it has been, is, and will be, constant in inconstancy; for God requires that which is past, repeats what he has formerly done, and deals with us no otherwise than as he has used to deal with good men; and shall the earth be forsaken for us, or the rock removed out of his place? There has no change befallen us, nor any temptation by it taken us, but such as is common to men. Let us not be proud and secure in prosperity, for God may recall a past trouble, and order that to seize us, and spoil our mirth; (Ps. 30. 7.) nor let us despond in adversity, for God may call back the comforts that are past, as he did to Job. We may apply this to our past actions, and our behaviour under the changes that have affected us, God will call us to account for that which is past; and therefore when we enter into a new condition we should judge ourselves for our sins in our former condition, prosperous or afflicted.

16. And moreover, I saw under the sun the place of judgment, that wickedness was there; and the place of righteousness, that iniquity was there. 17. I said in mine heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked: for there is a time there for every purpose and for every work. 18. I said in mine heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them, and that they might see that they themselves are beasts. 19. For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them: as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath: so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast: for all is vanity. 20. All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. 21. Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth? 22. Wherefore I perceive that there is nothing better, than that a man should rejoice in his own works; for that is his portion: for who shall bring him to see what shall be after him?

Solomon is still shewing that every thing in this world, without piety and the fear of God, is vanity. Take away religion, and there is nothing valuable among men, nothing for the sake of which a wise man would think it worth while to live in this world. In these verses, he shews that power, than which there is nothing men are more ambitious of, and life itself, than which there is nothing men are more fond, more jealous, of, are nothing without the fear of God.

I. Here is the vanity of man as mighty; man in his best estate, man upon the throne, where his authority is submitted to, man upon the judgment-seat, where his wisdom and justice are appealed to, and where, if he be governed by the laws of religion, he is God's vicegerent; nay, he is of those to whom it is said, Ye are gods; but without the fear of God it is vanity, for, set that aside, and,

1. The judge will not judge aright, will not use his power well, but will abuse it; instead of doing good with it, will do hurt with it, and then it is not only vanity, but a lie, a cheat to himself, and to all about him, v. 16. Solomon perceived, by what he had read of former times, what he heard of other countries, and what he had seen in some corrupt judges, even in the land of Israel, notwithstanding all his care to prefer good men, that there was wickedness in the place of judgment. It is not so above the sun; far be it from God that he should do iniquity, or pervert justice; but under the sun it is often found that that which should be the refuge proves the prison of oppressed innocency. Man, being in honour, and not understanding what he ought to do, becomes like the beasts that perish, like the beasts of prey, even the most ravenous, Ps. 49. 20. Not only from the persons that sat in judgment, but even in the places where judgment was, in pretence, administered, and righteousness was expected, there was iniquity; men met with the greatest wrongs in those courts to which they fled for right; this is vanity and vexation; for, (1.) It had been better for the people to have had no judges than to have had such. (2.) It had been better for the judges to have had no power than to have had it and used it to such ill purposes; and so they will say another day.

2. The judge will himself be judged for not judging right. When Solomon saw how judgment was perverted among men, he looked up to God the Judge, and looked forward to the day of his judgment; (v. 17.) I said in my heart, that this unrighteous judgment is not so conclusive as both sides take it to be, for there will be a review of the judgment; God shall judge between the righteous and the wicked, shall judge for the righteous, and plead their cause, though now it is run down, and judge against the wicked, and reckon with them for all their unrighteous decrees, and the grievousness which they have prescribed, Isa. 10. 1. With an eye of faith we may see, not only the period, but the punishment, of the pride and cruelty of oppressors, (Ps. 92. 7.) and it is an unspeakable comfort to the oppressed, that their cause will be heard over again. Let them therefore wait with patience, for there is another Judge that stands before the door. And though the day of affliction may last long, yet there is a time, a set time, for the examination of every purpose and every work done under the sun. Men have their day now, but God's day is coming, Ps. 37. 13. With God there is a time for the rehearing of causes, redressing of grievances, and reversing of unjust decrees, though as yet we see it not here, Job, 24. 1.

II. Here is the vanity of man as mortal. He now comes to speak more generally concerning the estate of the sons of men in this world, their life and being on earth, and shews that their reason, without religion and the fear of God, advances them but little above the beasts. Now observe,

1. What he aims at in this account of man's estate.

(1.) That God may be honoured, may be justified, may be glorified; that they might clear God, so the margin reads it; that, if men have an uneasy life in this world, full of vanity and vexation, they may thank themselves, and lay no blame on God; let them clear him, and not say, that he made this world to be man's prison, and life to be his penance; no, God made man, in respect both of honour and comfort, little lower than the angels; if he be mean and miserable, it is his own fault. Or, that God, the word of God, might manifest them, and discover them to themselves, and so appear to be quick and powerful, and a Judge of men's characters; and we may be made sensible how open we lie to God's knowledge and judgment.

(2.) That men may be humbled, may be vilified, may be mortified; that they might see that they themselves are beasts. It is much to convince proud men that they are but men, (Ps. 9. 20.) much more to convince bad men that they are beasts, that, being destitute of religion, they are as the beasts that perish, as the horse and the mule that have no understanding. Proud oppressors are as beasts, as roaring lions, and ranging bears. Nay, every man that minds his body only, and not his soul, makes himself no better than a brute, and must wish, at least, to die like one.

2. The manner in which he verifies this account; that which he undertakes to prove, is, that a wordly, carnal, earthly-minded man, has no preeminence above the beast, for all that which he sets his heart upon, places his confidence, and expects a happiness, in, is vanity, v. 19. Some make this to be the language of an atheist, who justifies himself in his iniquity, (v. 16.) and evades the argument taken from the judgment to come, (v. 17.) by pleading that there is not another life after this, but that when man dies, there is an end of him, and therefore, while he lives, he may live as he lists; but others rather think Solomon here speaks as he himself thinks, and that it is to be understood in the same sense with that of his father, (Ps. 49. 14.) Like sheep they are laid in the grave, and that he intends to shew the vanity of this world's wealth and honours, "by the equal condition in mere outward respects" (as Bishop Reynolds expounds it) "between men and beasts."

(1.) The events concerning both seem much alike; (v. 19.) That which befalls the sons of men, is no other than that which befalls beasts; a great deal of knowledge of human bodies is gained by the anatomy of the bodies of brutes. When the deluge swept away the old world, the beasts perished with mankind. Horses and men are killed in battle with the same weapons of war.

(2.) The end of both, to an eye of sense, seems alike too; They have all one breath, and breathe in the same air, and it is the general description of both, that in their nostrils is the breath of life, (Gen. 7. 22.) and, therefore, as the one dies, so dies the other; in their expiring there is no visible difference, but death makes much the same change with a beast that it does with a man.

[1.] As to their bodies, the change is altogether the same, except the different respects that are paid to them by the survivors. Let a man be buried with the burial of an ass, (Jer. 22. 19.) and what pre-eminence then has he above a beast? The touch of the dead body of a man, by the law of Moses, contracted a greater ceremonial pollution than the touch of the carcase even of an unclean beast or fowl. And Solomon here observes, that all go unto one place, the dead bodies of men and beasts putrefy alike, all are of the dust, in their original, for we see all turn to dust again, in their corruption. What little reason then have we to be proud of our bodies, or any bodily accomplishments, when they must not only be reduced to the earth very shortly, but must be so in common with the beasts, and we must mingle our dust with theirs!

[2.] As to their spirits, there is indeed a vast difference, but not a visible one, v. 21. It is certain that the spirit of the sons of men at death is ascending, it goes upward to the Father of spirits, who made it, to the world of spirits, to which it is allied; it dies not with the body, but is redeemed from the power of the grave, Ps. 49. 15. It goes upward, to be judged, and determined to an unchangeable state. It is as certain that the spirit of the beast goes downward to the earth, it dies with the body, it perishes, and is gone at death. The soul of a beast is, at death, like a candle blown out, there is an end of it; whereas the soul of a man is then like a candle taken out of a dark lantern, which leaves the lantern useless indeed, but does itself shine brighter. This great difference there is between the spirits of men and beasts; and a good reason it is why men should set their affections on things above, and lift up their souls to those things, not suffering them, as if they were the souls of brutes, to cleave to this earth. But who knows this difference? We cannot see the ascent of the one, and the descent of the other, with our bodily eyes; and therefore those that live by sense, as all carnal sensualists do, that walk in the sight of their eyes, and will not admit any other discoveries, by their own rule of judgment, have no pre-eminence above the beasts, Who knows? Who considers this? Isa. 53. 1. Very few; were it better considered, the world would be every way better; but most men live as if they were to be here always, or as if, when they die, there were an end of them; and it is not strange that those live like beasts, who think they shall die like beasts; but on such the noble faculties of reason are perfectly lost and thrown away.

3. An inference drawn from it; (v. 22.) There is nothing better, as to this world, nothing better to be had out of our wealth and honour, than that a man should rejoice in his own works.

(1.) Keep a clear conscience, and never admit iniquity into the place of righteousness. Let every man prove his own work, and approve himself to God in it, so shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, Gal. 6.4. Let him not get or keep any thing but what he can rejoice in. See 2 Cor. 1.12. (2.) Live a cheerful life. If God have prospered the work of our hands unto us, let us rejoice in it, and take the comfort of it, and not make it a burthen to ourselves, and leave others the joy of it; for that is our portion, not the portion of our souls, miserable are they that have their portion in this life, (Ps. 17.14.) and fools are they that choose it and take up with it, (Luke, 12.19.) but it is the portion of the body; that only which we enjoy is our's out of this world; it is taking what is to be had, and making the best of it; and the reason is, because none can give us a sight of what shall be after us; either who shall have our estates, or what use they will make of them. When we are gone, it is likely we shall not see what is after us; there is no correspondence that we know of between the other world and this, Job, 14.21. They in the other world will be wholly taken up with that world, so that they will not care for seeing what is done in this; and while we are here, we cannot foresee what shall be after us, either as to our families or the public; it is not for us to know the times and seasons that shall be after us; which, as it should be a restraint to our cares about this world, so it should be a reason for our concern about another. Since death is a final farewell to this life, let us look before us to another life.

CHAP. IV.

Solomon, having shewed the vanity of this world, in the temptation which those in power feel to oppress and trample upon their subjects, here further shews. I. The temptation which the oppressed feel to discontent and impatience, v. 1..3. II. The temptation which those that love their ease feel to take their ease and neglect business, for fear of being envied, v. 4..6. III. The folly of hoarding up abundance of worldly wealth, v. 7, 8. IV. A remedy against that folly, in being made sensible of the benefit of society and mutual assistance, v. 9..12. V. The mutability even of royal dignity, not only through the folly of the prince himself, (v. 13, 14.) but through the fickleness of the people, let the prince be ever so discreet, v. 15, 16. It is not the prerogative even of kings themselves to be exempted from the vanity and vexation that attend these things; let none else then expect it.

1. SO I returned, and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun: and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power; but they had no comforter. 2. Wherefore I praised the dead which are already dead more than the living which are yet alive. 3. Yea, better is he than both they, which hath not yet been, who hath not seen the evil work that is done under the sun.

Solomon had a large soul, (1 Kings, 4.29.) and it appeared by this, among other things, that he had a very tender concern for the miserable part of mankind, and took cognizance of the afflictions of the afflicted. He had taken the oppressors to task, (ch. 3.16, 17.) and put them in mind of the judgment to come, to be a curb to their insolence; now here he observes the oppressed; this he did, no doubt, as a prince, to do them justice, and avenge them of their adversaries, for he both feared God and regarded men: but here he does it as a preacher, and shews,

1. The troubles of their condition; (v.1.) of these he speaks very feelingly, and with compassion. It grieved him,

(1.) To see might prevailing against right, to see so much oppression done under the sun; to see servants, and labourers, and poor workmen, oppressed by their masters, who take advantage of their necessity to impose what terms they please upon them; debtors oppressed by cruel creditors, and creditors too by fraudulent debtors; tenants oppressed by hard landlords, and orphans by treacherous guardians; and, worst of all, subjects oppressed by arbitrary princes and unjust judges. Such oppressions are done under the sun, above the sun righteousness reigns for ever. Wise men will consider these oppressions, and contrive to do something for the relief of those that are oppressed. Blessed is he that considers the poor.

(2.) To see how those that were wronged laid to heart the wrongs that were done them. He beheld the tears of such as were oppressed, and perhaps could not forbear weeping with them. The world is a place of weepers; look which way we will, we have a melancholy scene presented to us, the tears of those that are oppressed with one trouble or other. They find it is to no purpose to complain, and therefore mourn in secret, (as Job, ch. 16. 20.—30. 28.) but Blessed are they that mourn.

(3.) To see how unable they were to help themselves; On the side of their oppressors there was power, when they had done wrong, to stand to it, and make good what they had done, so that the poor were borne down with a strong hand, and had no way to do themselves right. It is sad to see power misplaced, and that which was given men to enable them to do good, perverted to support them in doing wrong.

(4.) To see how they and their calamities were slighted by all about them. They wept, and needed comfort, but there was none to do that friendly office, they had no comforter, their oppressors were powerful and threatening, and therefore they had no comforter; they that should comfort them durst not, for fear of displeasing the oppressors, and being made their companions for offering to be their comforters. It is sad to see so little humanity among men.

2. The temptations of their condition. Being thus hardly used, they are tempted to hate and despise life, and to envy those that are dead and in their graves, and to wish they had never been born; (v. 2, 3.) and Solomon is ready to agree with them, for it serves to prove that all is vanity and vexation, since life itself is often so; and if we disregard it, in comparison with the favour and fruition of God, (as St. Paul, Acts, 20. 24. Phil. 1. 23.) it is car praise; but if (as here) only for the sake of the miseries that attend it, it is our infirmity, and we judge therein after the flesh, as Job and Elijah did.

(1.) He here thinks them happy who have ended this miserable life, have done their part, and quitted the stage; I praised the dead that are already dead, slain outright, or that had a speedy passage through the world, made a short cut over the ocean of life, dead already, before they had well begun to live; I was pleased with their lot, and, had it been in their own choice, should have praised their wisdom, for but looking into the world, and then retiring, as not liking it. I concluded that it is better with them than with the living that are yet alive, and that is all, dragging the long and heavy chain of life, and wearing out its tedious minutes. This may be compared, not with Job, 3. 20, 21. but with Rev. 14. 13. where, in times of persecution, (and such Solomon is here describing,) it is not the passion of man, but the Spirit of God, that says, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth. Note, The condition of the saints that are dead, and gone to rest with God, is, upon many accounts, better and more desirable than the condition of living saints that are yet continued in their work and warfare.

(2.) He thinks them happy, who never began this miserable life; nay, they are happiest of all; He that has not been is happier than both they. Better never to have been born than be born to see the evil work that is done under the sun; to see so much wickedness committed, so much wrong done, and not only to be in no capacity to mend the matter, but to suffer ill for doing well. A good man, how calamitous a condition soever he is in in this world, cannot have cause to wish he had never been born, since he is glorifying the Lord even in the fires, and will be happy at last, for ever happy; nor ought any to wish so while they are alive, for while there is life, there is hope; a man is never undone till he is in hell.

4. Again, I considered all travail, and every right work, that for this a man is envied of his neighbour. This is also vanity and vexation of spirit. 5. The fool foldeth his hands together, and eateth his own flesh. 6. Better is an handful with quietness, than both the hands full with travail and vexation of spirit.

Here Solomon returns to the observation and consideration of the vanity and vexation of spirit that attend the business of this world, which he had spoken of before, ch. 2. 11.

1. If a man be acute, and dexterous, and successful in his business, he gets the ill-will of his neighbours, v. 4. Though he takes a great deal of pains, and goes through all travail, does not get his estate easily, but it costs him a great deal of hard labour, nor does he get it dishonestly, he wrongs no man, defrauds no man, but by every right work, by applying himself to his own proper business, and managing it by all the rules of equity and fair-dealing, yet for this he is envied of his neighbour, and the more for the reputation he has got by his honesty. This shews, (1.) What little conscience most men have, that they will bear a grudge to a neighbour, give him an ill word, and do him an ill turn, only because he is more ingenious and industrious than themselves, and has more of the blessing of heaven. Cain envied Abel, Esau Jacob, and Saul David, and all for their right works. This is downright diabolism. (2.) What little comfort wise and useful men must expect to have in this world. Let them behave themselves ever so cautiously, they cannot escape being envied; and who can stand before envy? Prov. 27. 4. They that excel in virtue will always be an eye-sore to those that exceed in vice; which should not discourage us from any right work, but drive us to expect the praise of it, not from men, but from God, and not to count upon satisfaction and happiness in the creature; for if right works prove vanity and vexation of spirit, no works under the sun can prove otherwise. But for every right work a man shall be accepted of his God, and then he needs not mind though he be envied of his neighbour, only it may make him love the world the less.

2. If a man be stupid and dull, and blundering in his business, he does ill for himself; (v. 5.) The fool that goes about his work as if his hands were muffled and folded together, that does every thing awkwardly; the sluggard, (for he is a fool,) that loves his ease, and folds his hands together to keep them warm, because they refuse to labour, he eats his own flesh, is a cannibal to himself, brings himself into such a poor condition that he has nothing to eat but his own flesh, into such a desperate condition, that he is ready to eat his own flesh for vexation; he has a dog's life, hunger and ease. Because he sees active men, that thrive in the world, envied, he runs into the other extreme; and, lest he should be envied for his right works, he does every thing wrong, and does not deserve to be pitied. Note, Idleness is a sin that is its own punishment.

The following words, (v. 6.) Better is a handful with quietness, than both the hands full with travail and vexation of spirit, may be taken either, (1.) As the sluggard's argument for the excuse of himself in his idleness; he folds his hands together, and abuses and misapplies a good truth for his justification; as if, because a little with quietness is better than abundance with strife, therefore a little with idleness is better than abundance with honest labour: thus wise in his own conceit is he, Prov. 26. 16. But, (2.) I rather take it as Solomon's advice to keep the mean between that travail which will make a man envied, and that slothfulness which will make a man eat his own flesh. Let us by honest industry lay hold on the handful, that we may not want necessities, but not grasp at both the hands full, which will but create us vexation of spirit. Moderate pains and moderate gains will do best. A man may have but a handful of the world, and yet may enjoy it and himself with a great deal of quietness, with content of mind, peace of conscience, and the love and good will of his neighbours, while many that have both their hands full, have more than heart could wish, have a great deal of travail and vexation with it. Those that cannot live on a little, it is to be feared, would not live as they should, if they had ever so much.

7. Then I returned, and I saw vanity under the sun. 8. There is one alone, and there is not a second; yea, he hath neither child nor brother: yet is there no end of all his labour: neither is his eye satisfied with riches; neither saith he, For whom do I labour, and bereave my soul of good? This is also vanity, yea, it is a sore travail. 9. Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labour. 10. For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow: but woe to him that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up. 11. Again, if two lie together, then they have heat: but how can one be warm alone? 12. And if one prevail against him, two shall withstand him; and a threefold cord is not quickly broken.

Here Solomon fastens upon another instance of the vanity of this world, that frequently the more men have of it, the more they would have; and on this they are so intent, that they have no enjoyment of what they have. Now Solomon here shews,

1. That selfishness is the cause of this evil; (v. 7, 8.) There is one alone that minds none but himself, cares for nobody, but would, if he could, be placed alone in the midst of the earth; there is not a second, nor does he desire there should be, one mouth he thinks enough in a house, and grudges every thing that goes beside him. See how this covetous muckworm is here described.

(1.) He makes himself a mere slave to his business. Though he has no charge, neither child nor brother, none to take care of but himself, none to hang upon him, or draw from him, no poor relations, nor dares he marry, for fear of the expence of a family, yet is there no end of his labour, he is at it night and day, early and late, and will scarcely allow necessary rest to himself and those he employs. He does not confine himself within the bounds of his own calling, but is for having a hand in any thing that he can get by. See Ps. 127. 2.

(2.) He never thinks he has enough; His eye is not satisfied with riches. Covetousness is called the lust of the eye, (1 John, 2. 16.) because the beholding of it with his eyes is all that the worldling seems to covet, Ecc. 5. 11. He has enough for his back, (as Bishop Reynolds observes,) for his belly, for his calling, for his family, for his living decently in the world, but he has not enough for his eyes; though he can but see it, can but count his money, and not find in his heart to use it, yet he is not easy because he has not more to regale his eyes with.

(3.) He denies himself the comfort of what he has. He bereaves his soul of good. If our souls be bereaved of good, it is we ourselves that do bereave them; others may bereave us of outward good, but cannot rob us of our graces and comforts, our spiritual good things; it is our own fault if we do not enjoy ourselves; yet many are so set upon the world, that, in pursuit of it, they bereave their souls of good here and for ever, make shipwreck of faith and of a good conscience, bereave themselves not only of the favour of God and eternal life, but of the pleasures of this world too, and this present life. Worldly people, pretending to be wise for themselves, are really enemies to themselves.

(4.) He has no excuse for doing this; He has neither child nor brother; none that he is bound to, on whom he may lay out what he has to his satisfaction while he lives; none that he has a kindness for, for whom he may lay it up to his satisfaction, and to whom he may leave it when he dies; none that are poor or dear to him.

(5.) He has not consideration enough to shew himself the folly of this: he never puts this question to himself, "For whom do I labour thus? Do I labour, as I should, for the glory of God, and that I may have to give to those that need? Do I consider that it is but for the body that I am labouring, a dying body; it is for others, and I know not for whom; perhaps for a fool that will scatter it as fast as I have gathered it; perhaps for a foe, that will be ungrateful to my memory?" Note, It is wisdom for those that take pains about this world, to consider whom they take all this pains for; and whether it be really worth while to bereave themselves of good, that they may bestow it on a stranger. If men do not consider this, it is vanity, and a sore travail; they shame and vex themselves to no purpose.

2. That sociableness is the cure of this evil. Men are thus sordid, because they are all for themselves. Now Solomon shews here, by divers instances, that it is not good for man to be alone; (Gen. 2. 18.) he designs hereby to recommend to us both marriage and friendship, two things which covetous misers decline, because of the charge of them; but such are the comfort and advantage of them both, if prudently contracted, that they will very well quit cost. Man, in paradise itself, could not be happy without a mate, and therefore is no sooner made than matched.

(1.) Solomon lays this down for a truth, That two are better than one, and more happy jointly than either of them could be separately; more pleased in one another than they could be in themselves only; mutually serviceable to each other's welfare, and by a united strength more likely to do good to others; They have a good reward of their labour; whatever service they do, it is returned to them another way. He that serves himself only, has himself only for his pay-master, and commonly proves more unjust and ungrateful to himself than his friend, if he should serve him, would be to him; witness him that labours endlessly, and yet bereaves his soul of good; he has no reward of his labour; but he that is kind to another has a good reward; the pleasure and advantage of holy love will be an abundant recompence for all the work and labour of love.

(2.) Hence he infers the mischief of solitude; Woe to him that is alone: he lies exposed to many temptations which good company and friendship would prevent and help him to guard against; he wants that advantage which a man has by the countenance of his friend, as iron has of being sharpened by iron. A monastic life then was surely never intended for a state of perfection, nor should those be reckoned the greatest lovers of God who cannot find in their hearts to love any one else.

3. He proves it by divers instances of the benefit of friendship and good conversation.

(1.) Occasional succour in an exigence. It is good for two to travel together, for if one happen to fall, and perhaps so as not to be able to get up himself, the other will be ready to help him up; a friend in need is a friend indeed; whereas if one travel alone, and get a fall, he may be lost for want of a little help. If a man fall into sin, his friend will help to restore him with the spirit of meekness; if he fall into trouble, his friend will help to comfort him and assuage his grief.

(2.) Mutual warmth. As a fellow-traveller is of use, (amicus pro vehiculo—a friend is a good substitute for a carriage), so is a bed-fellow; If two lie together, they have heat. So virtuous and gracious affections are excited by good society, and Christians warm one another by provoking one another to love and to good works.

(3.) United strength. If an enemy find a man alone, he is likely to prevail against him; with his own single strength he cannot make his part good, but, if he have a second, he may do well enough, two shall withstand him; "You shall help me against my enemy, and I will help you against your's; according to the agreement between Joab and Abishai, (2 Sam. 10. 11.) and so both are conquerors, whereas, acting separately, both had been conquered; as was said of the ancient Britons, when the Romans invaded them, Dum singuli pugnabant, universi vincuntur—While they fight in detached parties, they sacrifice the general cause. In our spiritual warfare we may be helpful to one another as well as in our spiritual work; next to the comfort of communion with God, is that of the communion of saints. He concludes with this proverb, A threefold cord is not easily broken, any more than a bundle of arrows, though each single thread and each single arrow is. Two together he compares to a threefold cord; for where two are closely joined in holy love and fellowship, Christ will by his Spirit come to them, and make the third, as he joined himself to the two disciples going to Emmaus, and then there is a threefold cord that can never be broken. They that dwell in love dwell in God, and God in them.

13. Better is a poor and a wise child than an old and foolish king, who will no more be admonished.

14. For out of prison he cometh to reign; whereas also he that is born in his kingdom becometh poor.

15. I considered all the living which walk under the sun, with the second child that shall stand up in his stead. 16. There is no end of all the people, even of all that have been before them: they also that come after shall not rejoice in him. Surely this also is vanity and vexation of spirit.

Solomon was himself a king, and therefore may be allowed to speak more freely than another, concerning the vanity of kingly state and dignity, which he shews here to be an uncertain thing, he had said so, Prov. 27. 24. The crown doth not endure to every generation; and his son found it so. Nothing is more slippery than the highest post of honour without wisdom and the people's love.

1. A king is not happy, unless he have wisdom, v. 13, 14. He that is truly wise, prudent, and pious, though he be poor in the world, and very young, and, upon both accounts, despised and little taken notice of, is better, more truly valuable and worthy of respect, is likely to do better for himself, and to be a greater blessing to his generation, than a king, than an old king, a man therefore venerable, both for his gravity and for his dignity, if he be foolish, and knows not how to manage public affairs himself, nor will be admonished and advised by others; who knows not to be admonished, will not suffer any counsel or admonition to be given him; no one about him dares contradict him; he will not hearken to the counsel and admonition that are given him. It is so far from being any part of the honour of kings, that it is the greatest dishonour to them that can be, not to be admonished. Folly and wilfulness commonly go together, and those that most need admonition, can worst bear it; but neither age nor titles will secure men respect, if they have not true wisdom and virtue to recommend them; while wisdom and virtue will gain men honour, even under the disadvantages of youth and poverty.

To prove the wise child better than the foolish king, he shews what each of them come to, v. 14. (1.) A poor man by his wisdom comes to be preferred, as Joseph, who, when he was but young, was brought out of prison to be the second man in the kingdom; to which story Solomon seems here to refer. Providence sometimes raises the poor out of the dust to set them among princes, Ps. 113. 7, 8. Wisdom has wrought not only the liberty of men, but their dignity, raised them from the dunghill, from the dungeon, to the throne. (2.) A king by his folly and wilfulness comes to be impoverished; though he was born in his kingdom, came to it by inheritance, though he has lived to be old in it, and has had time to fill his treasures, yet, if he take ill courses, and will no more be admonished as he has been, thinking, because he is old, he is past it, he becomes poor, his treasure is exhausted, and perhaps he is forced to resign his crown, and retire into privacy.

2. A king is not likely to continue, if he have not a confirmed interest in the affections of the people; that is intimated, but somewhat obscurely, in the two last verses. (1.) He that is king must have a successor, a second, a child that shall stand up in his stead; his own, suppose, or perhaps that poor and wise child spoken of, v. 13. Kings, when they grow old, must have the mortification of seeing those that are to jostle them out, and stand up in their stead. (2.) It is common with the people to adore the rising sun; all the living which walk under the sun are with the second child, are in his interests, are conversant with him, and make their court to him more than to the father, whom they look upon as going off, and despise because his best days are past. Solomon considered this, he saw this to be the disposition of his own people, which appeared immediately after his death, in their complaints of his government, and their affectation of a change. (3.) People are never long easy and satisfied; There is no end, no rest, of all the people; they are continually fond of changes, and know not what they would have. (4.) This is no new thing, but it has been the way of all that have been before them; there have been instances of this in every age, even Samuel and David could not always please. (5.) As it has been, so it is like to be still; They that came after will be of the same spirit, and shall not long rejoice in him whom at first they seemed extremely fond of. To-day, Hosanna, to-morrow, Crucify. (6.) It cannot but be a great grief to princes, to see themselves thus slighted by those they have studied to oblige, and have depended upon; there is no faith in man, no steadfastness; This is vanity and vexation of spirit.

CHAP. V.

Solomon, in this chapter, discourses, I. Concerning the worship of God, prescribing that as a remedy against all those vanities which he had already observed to be in wisdom, learning, pleasure, honour, power, and business. That we may not be deceived by those things, nor have our spirits vexed with the disappointments we meet in them, let us make conscience of our duty to God, and keep up our communion with him; but withal, he gives a necessary caution against the vanities which are too often found in religious exercises, which deprive them of their excellency, and render them unable to help against other vanities. If our religion be a vain religion, how great is that vanity! Let us therefore take heed of vanity, 1. In hearing the word, and offering sacrifice, v. 1. 2. In prayer, v. 2, 3. 3. In making vows, v. 4. 6. 4. In pretending to divine dreams, v. 7. Now, (1.) For a remedy against those vanities, he prescribes the fear of God, v. 7. (2.) To prevent the offence that might arise from the present sufferings of good people, he directs us to look up to God, v. 8. II. Concerning the wealth of this world, and the vanity and vexation that attend it. The fruits of the earth indeed are necessary to the support of life, (v. 9.) but as for silver, and gold, and riches, 1. They are unsatisfying, v. 10. 2. They are unprofitable, v. 11. 3. They are disquieting, v. 12. 4. They often prove hurtful and destroying, v. 13. 5. They are perishing, v. 14. 6. They must be left behind when we die, v. 15, 16. 7. If we have not a heart to make use of them, they occasion a great deal of uneasiness, v. 17. And therefore he recommends to us the comfortable use of that which God has given us, with an eye to him that is the Giver, as the best way both to answer the end of our having it, and to obviate the mischiefs that commonly attend great estates, v. 18. 20. So that, if we can but learn out of this chapter how to manage the business of religion, and the business of this world, (which two take up most of our time,) so that both may turn to a good account, and neither our sabbath-days nor our week-days may be lost, we shall have reason to say, We have learned two good lessons.

1. KEEP thy foot when thou goest to the house of God, and be more ready to hear, than to give the sacrifice of fools: for they consider not that they do evil. 2. Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter any thing before God: for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth: therefore let thy words be few. 3. For a dream cometh through the multitude of business; and a fool's voice is known by multitude of words.

Solomon's design in driving us off from the world, by shewing us its vanity, is to drive us to God and to our duty; that we may not walk in the way of the world, but by religious rules, nor depend upon the wealth of the world, but on religious advantages; and therefore,

1. He here sends us to the house of God, to the place of public worship, to the temple, which he himself had built at a vast expence; when he reflected with regret on all his other works, (ch. 2. 4.) he did not repent that, but reflected on it with pleasure; yet mentions it not, lest he should seem to reflect on it with pride; but he here sends those to it that would know more of the vanity of the world, and would find that happiness which is in vain sought for in the creature. David, when he was perplexed, went into the sanctuary of God, Ps. 73. 17. Let our disappointments in the creature turn our eyes to the Creator, let us have recourse to the word of God's grace, and consult that, to the throne of his grace, and solicit that. In the word and prayer there is a balm for every wound.

II. He charges us to behave ourselves well there, that we may not miss of our end in coming thither. Religious exercises are not vain things, but, if we mismanage them, they become vain to us. And therefore,

1. We must address ourselves to them with all possible seriousness and care; "Keep thy foot, not keep it back from the house of God, (as Prov. 25. 17.) nor go slowly thither, as one unwilling to draw nigh to God, but look well to thy goings, ponder the path of thy feet, lest thou take a false step. Address thyself to the worship of God with a solemn pause, and take time to compose thyself for it, not going about it with precipitation, which is called hasting with the feet, Prov. 19. 2. Keep thy thoughts from roving and wandering from the work; keep thy affections from running out toward wrong objects, for in the business of God's house there is work enough for the whole man, and all too little to be employed." Some think it alludes to the charge given to Moses and Joshua, to put off their shoes, (Exod. 3. 5. Josh. 5. 15.) in token of subjection and reverence, Keep thy feet clean, Exod. 30. 19.

2. We must take heed that the sacrifice we bring be not the sacrifice of fools, of wicked men, for they are fools, and their sacrifice is an abomination to the Lord; (Prov. 15. 8.) that we bring not the torn, and the lame, and the sick, for sacrifice; for we are plainly told that it will not be accepted, and therefore it is folly to bring it; that we rest not in the sign and ceremony, and the outside of the performance, without regarding the sense and meaning of it, for that is the sacrifice of fools; bodily exercise, if that be all, is a jest; none but fools will think thus to please him who is a Spirit, and requires the heart; and they will see their folly when they find what a great deal of pains they have taken to no purpose for want of sincerity. They are fools, for they consider not that they do evil; they think they are doing God and themselves good service, when really they are putting a great affront upon God, and a great cheat upon their own souls, by their hypocritical devotions. Men may be doing evil, even then when they profess to be doing good, and even then when they do not know it, when they do not consider it. They know not but to do evil, so some read it. Wicked minds cannot choose but sin, even in the acts of devotion. Or, They consider not that they do evil; they act at a venture, right or wrong, pleasing to God or not, it is all one to them.

3. That we may not bring the sacrifice of fools, we must come to God's house with hearts disposed to know and do our duty. We must be ready to hear. (1.) We must diligently attend to the word of God read and preached; "Be swift to hear the exposition which the priests give of the sacrifices, declaring the intent and meaning of them, and do not think it enough to gaze upon what they do, for it must be a reasonable service, otherwise it is the sacrifice of fools." (2.) We must resolve to comply with the will of God as it is made known to us; hearing is often put for obeying, and that is it that is better than sacrifice, 1 Sam. 15. 22. Isa. 1. 15, 16. We then come in a right frame to holy duties, when we come with this upon our heart, Speak, Lord, for thy servant hears. Let the word of the Lord come, (said a good man,) and if I had 600 necks I would bow them all to the authority of it.

4. We must be very cautious and considerate in all our approaches and addresses to God; (v. 2.) Be not rash with thy mouth, in making either prayers, or protestations, or promises; let not thine heart be hasty to utter any thing before God. Note, (1.) When we are in the house of God, in solemn assemblies for religious worship, we are in a special manner before God, and in his presence; there where he has promised to meet his people, where his eye is upon us, and ours' ought to be unto him. (2.) We have something to say, something to utter before God, when we draw nigh to him in holy duties; he is one with whom we have to do, with whom we have business of vast importance. If we come without an errand, we shall go away without any advantage. (3.) What we utter before God must come from the heart, and therefore we must not be rash with our mouth, never let our tongue out-run our thoughts in our devotions; the words of our mouth must always be the product of the meditation of our hearts. Thoughts are words to God, and words are but wind, if they be not copied from the thoughts. Lip-labour, though ever so well laboured, if that be all, is but lost labour in religion, Matth. 15. 8, 9. (4.) It is not enough that what we say comes from the heart, but it must come from a composed heart, and not from a sudden heat or passion. As the mouth must not be rash, so the heart must not be hasty; we must not only think, but think twice, before we speak, when we are to speak either from God in preaching, or to God in prayer, and not utter any thing indecent and undigested, 1 Cor. 14. 15.

5. We must be sparing of our words in the presence of God, we must be reverent and deliberate; not talk to God as boldly and carelessly as we do to one another, not speak what comes uppermost, not repeat things over and over, as we do to one another, that what we say may be understood and remembered, and may make impression; no, when we speak to God, we must consider,

(1.) That between him and us there is an infinite distance: God is in heaven, where he reigns in glory over us and all the children of men, where he is attended with an innumerable company of holy angels, and is far exalted above all our blessing and praise. We are on earth, the footstool of his throne; we are mean and vile, unlike God, and utterly unworthy to receive any favour from him, or to have any communion with him; therefore we must be very grave, humble, and serious, and be reverent in speaking to him, as we are when we speak to a great man that is much our superior; and, in token of this, let our words be few, that they may be well-chosen, Job, 9. 14. This does not condemn all long prayers; were they not good, the Pharisees had not used them for a pretence; Christ prayed all night; and we are bid to continue in prayer; but it condemns careless, heartless, praying, vain repetitions, (Matth. 6. 7.) repeating Pater-nosters by tale. Let us speak to God, and of him, in his own words, words which the scripture teaches; and let our words, words of our own invention, be few, lest, not speaking by rule, we speak amiss.

(2.) That the multiplying of words in our devotions will make them the sacrifices of fools, v. 3. As confused dreams, frightful and perplexed, and such as disturb the sleep, are an evidence of a hurry of business which fills our head; so, many words, and hasty ones, used in prayer, are an evidence of folly reigning in the heart, ignorance of, and unacquaintedness with, both God and ourselves, low thoughts of God, and careless thoughts of our own souls. Even in common conversation, a fool is known by the multitude of words; they that know least talk most, (ek. 10. 11.) particularly in devotion; there, no doubt, a prating fool shall fall, (Prov. 10. 8, 10.) shall fall short of acceptance. Those are fools indeed who think they shall be heard, in prayer, for their much speaking.

4. When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it; for he hath no pleasure in fools: pay that which thou hast vowed. 5. Better is it that thou shouldest not vow, than thou shouldest vow and not pay. 6. Suffer not thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin; neither say thou before the angel, that it was an error: wherefore should God be angry at thy voice, and destroy the work of thine hands? 7. For in the multitude of dreams and many words there are also divers vanities: but fear thou God. 8. If then seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at the matter: for he that is higher than the highest regardeth; and there be higher than they.

Four things we are exhorted to in these verses:

1. To be conscientious in paying our vows. A vow is a bond upon the soul, (Numb. 30. 2.) by which we solemnly oblige ourselves, not only, in general, to do that which we are already bound to do, but, in some particular instances, to do that to do which we were not under any antecedent obligation, whether it respects honouring God, or serving the interests of his kingdom among men. When, under the sense of some affliction, (Ps. 66. 14.) or in the pursuit of some mercy, (1 Sam. 1. 11.) thou hast vowed such a vow as this unto God, know that thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, and thou canst not go back; therefore,

1. Pay it; perform what thou hast promised, bring to God what thou hast dedicated and devoted to him, pay that which thou hast vowed, pay it in full, and keep not back any part of the price, pay it in kind, do not alter it, or change it, so the law was, Lev. 27. 10. Have we vowed to give our own selves unto the Lord? let us, then, be as good as our word, act in his service, to his glory, and not sacrilegiously alienate ourselves.

2. Defer not to pay it; if it be in the power of thine hands to pay it to-day, leave it not till to-morrow; do not beg a day, nor put it off to a more convenient season. By delay the sense of the obligation slackens and cools, and is in danger of wearing off; we thereby discover a loathness and backwardness to perform our vow; and, Qui non est hodie, cras minus aptus erit—He who is not inclined to-day, will be averse to-morrow; the longer it is put off, the more difficult it will be to bring ourselves to it; death may not only prevent the payment, but fetch thee to judgment, under the guilt of a broken vow.

Two reasons are here given why we should speedily and cheerfully pay our vows. (1.) Because otherwise we affront God; we play the fool with him, as if we designed to put a trick upon him; and God has no pleasure in fools; (more is implied than is expressed;) the meaning is, He greatly abhors such fools, and such foolish dealings. Has he need of fools? No; Be not deceived, God is not mocked, but will surely and severely reckon with those that thus play fast and loose with him. (2.) Because otherwise we wrong ourselves, we lose the benefit of the making of the vow, nay, we incur the penalty for the breach of it; so that it had been better a great deal not to have vowed, more safe, and more to our advantage, than to vow and not to pay. Not to have vowed had been but an omission, but to vow and not pay, incurs the guilt of treachery and perjury; it is lying to God, Acts, 5. 4.

II. To be cautious in making our vows; this is necessary in order to our being conscientious in performing them, v. 6. 1. We must take heed that we never vow any thing that is sinful, or may be an occasion of sin, for such a vow is ill-made, and must be broken. Suffer not thy mouth, by such a vow, to cause thy flesh to sin, as Herod's rash promise caused him to cut off the head of John the Baptist. 2. We must not vow that which, through the frailty of the flesh, we have reason to fear we shall not be able to perform; as those that vow a single life, and yet know not how to keep their vow. Hereby, (1.) They shame themselves; for they are forced to say before the angel, It was an error; that either they did not mean, or did not consider, what they said; and, take it which way you will, it is bad enough. "When thou hast made a vow, do not seek to evade it, nor find out excuses to get clear of the obligation of it; say not before the priest, who is called the angel, or messenger, of the Lord of hosts, that, upon second thoughts, thou hast changed thy mind, and desirest to be absolved from the obligation of thy vow; but stick to it, and do not seek a hole to creep out at." Some by the angel understand the guardian angel, which they suppose to attend every man, and to inspect what he does. Others understand it of Christ, the Angel of the covenant, who is present with his people in their assemblies, who searches the heart, and cannot be imposed upon; provoke him not, for God's name is in him, and he is represented as strict and jealous, Excd. 23. 20, 21. (2.) They expose themselves to the wrath of God, for he is angry at the voice of those that thus lie unto him with their mouth, and flatter him with their tongue, and is displeased at their dissimulation, and destroys the works of their hands, blasts their enterprises, and defeats those purposes which, when they made these vows, they were seeking to God for the success of. If we treacherously cancel the words of our mouths, and revoke our vows, God will justly overthrow our projects, and walk contrary, and at all adventures, with those that thus walk contrary, and at all adventures, with him. It is a snares to a man, after vows, to make inquiry.

III. To keep up the fear of God, v. 7. Many, of old, pretended to have known the mind of God by dreams, and were so full of them, that they almost made God's people forget his name by their dreams; (Jer. 23. 25, 26.) and many, now, perplex themselves with their frightful or odd dreams, or with other people's dreams, as if they foreboded this or the other disaster; those that heed dreams shall have a multitude of them to fill their heads with; but in them all there are divers vanities, as there are in many words, and the more, if we regard them. "They are but like the idle impertinent chat of children and fools, and therefore never heed them, forget them, instead of repeating them, lay no stress upon them, draw no disquieting conclusions from them, but fear thou God, have an eye to his sovereign dominion, set him before thee, keep thyself in his love, and be afraid of offending him, and then thou wilt not disturb thyself with foolish dreams." The way not to be dismayed at the signs of heaven, nor afraid of the idols of the heathen, is, to fear God as King of nations, Jer. 10. 2, 5, 7.

IV. With that to keep down the fear of man, v. 8. "Set God before thee, and then, if thou seest the oppression of the poor, thou wilt not marvel at the matter, nor find fault with Divine Providence, nor think the worse of the institution of magistracy, when thou seest the ends of it thus perverted, nor of religion, when thou seest it will not secure men from suffering wrong. Observe here,

1. A melancholy sight on earth, and such as cannot but trouble every good man that has a sense of justice and a concern for mankind, to see the oppression of the poor, because they are poor, and cannot right themselves, and the violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, oppression under colour of law, and backed with power. The kingdom in general may have a good government, and yet it may so happen that a particular province may be committed to a bad man, by whose mal-administration justice may be perverted; so hard it is for the wisest of kings, in giving preferments, to be sure of their men; they can but redress the grievance when it appears.

2. A comfortable sight in heaven. When things look thus dismal, we may satisfy ourselves with this,

(1.) That, though oppressors be high, God is above them, and in that very thing wherein they deal proudly, Exod. 18. 11. God is higher than the highest of creatures, than the highest of princes, than the king that is higher than Agag, (Numb. 24. 7.) than the highest angels, the thrones and dominions of the upper world; God is the Most High over all the earth, and his glory is above the heavens; before him, princes are worms, the brightest but glow-worms.

(2.) That, though oppressors be secure, God has his eye upon them, takes notice of, and will reckon for, all their violent perverting of judgment; he regards, not only sees it, but observes it, and keeps it on record, to be called over again; his eyes are upon their ways. See Job, 24. 23.

(3.) That there is a world of angels, for there are higher than they, who are employed by the divine justice for protecting the injured, and punishing the injurious. Sennacherib bore himself high upon his potent army, but one angel proved too hard for him and all his forces. Some, by those that are higher than they, understand the great council of the nation, the presidents to whom the princes of the provinces are accountable, (Dan. 6. 2.) the senate that receive complaints against the proconsuls, the courts above, to which appeals are made from the inferior courts, which are necessary to the good government of a kingdom. Let it be a check to oppressors, that perhaps their superiors on earth may call them to an account; however, God, the Supreme in heaven, will.

9. Moreover the profit of the earth is for all; the king himself is served by the field. 10. He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor be that loveth abundance with increase: this is also vanity. 11. When goods increase, they are increased that eat them; and what good is there to the owners thereof, saving the beholding of them with their eyes? 12. The sleep of a labouring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much; but the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep. 13. There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun, namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt. 14. But those riches perish by evil travail; and he begetteth a son, and there is nothing in his hand. 15. As he came forth of his mother's womb, naked shall he return to go as he came, and shall take nothing of his labour, which he may carry away in his hand. 16. And this also is a sore evil, that in all points as he came, so shall he go: and what profit hath he that hath laboured for the wind? 17. All his days also he eateth in darkness, and he hath much sorrow and wrath with his sickness.

Solomon had shewed the vanity of pleasure, gaiety, and fine works, of honour, power, and royal dignity; and there is many a covetous worldling that will agree with him, and speak as slightly as he does of these things; but money, he thinks, is a substantial thing, and, if he can but have enough of that, he is happy; that is the mistake which Solomon attacks, and attempts to rectify, in these verses; he shews that there is as much vanity in great riches, and the lust of the eye about them, as there is in the lusts of the flesh, and the pride of life; and a man can make himself no more happy by hoarding an estate than by spending it.

I. He grants that the products of the earth, for the support and comfort of human life, are valuable things; (v. 9.) The profit of the earth is for all; man's body, being made of the earth, thence has its maintenance; (Job, 28. 5.) and that it has so, and that a barren land is not made his dwelling, (as he has deserved for being rebellious, Ps. 68. 6.) is an instance of God's great bounty to him. There is profit to be got out of the earth, and it is for all, all need it, it is appointed for all, there is enough for all; it is not only for all men, but for all the inferior creatures; the same ground brings grass for the cattle that brings herbs for the service of men. Israel had bread from heaven, angels' food, but (which is a humbling consideration) the earth is our storehouse, and the beasts fellow-commoners with us. The king himself is served of the field, and would be ill-served, would be quite starved, without its products. This puts a great honour upon the husbandman's calling, that it is the most necessary of all other to the support of man's life; the many have the benefit of it, the mighty cannot live without it; it is for all, it is for the king himself. Those that have an abundance of the fruits of the earth, must remember they are for all, and therefore must look upon themselves but as stewards of their abundance, out of which they must give to those that need; dainty meats and soft clothing are only for some, but the fruit of the earth is for all. And even those that suck the abundance of the seas, (Deut. 33. 19.) cannot be without the fruit of the earth, while those that have a competency of the fruit of the earth may despise the abundance of the seas.

II. He maintains that the riches that are more than these, that are for hoarding, not for use, are vain things, and will not make a man easy or happy. That which our Saviour has said, (Luke, 12. 15.) that a man's life consists not in the abundance of the things which he possesses, is what Solomon here undertakes to prove by divers arguments.

1. The more men have, the more they would have, v. 10. A man may have but a little silver, and be satisfied with it, may know when he has enough, and covet no more. Godliness, with contentment, is great gain. I have enough, says Jacob; I have all, and abound, says St. Paul: but, (1.) He that loves silver, and sets his heart upon it, will never think he has enough, but enlarges his desire as hell, (Hab. 2. 5.) lays house to house and field to field, (Isa. 5. 8.) and, like the daughters of the horse-leech, still cries, Give, give. Natural desires are at rest when that which is desired is obtained, but corrupt desires are insatiable; nature is content with little, grace with less, but lust with nothing. (2.) He that has silver in abundance, and has it increasing ever so fast upon him, yet does not find that it yields any solid satisfaction to his soul; there are bodily desires which silver itself will not satisfy; if a man be hungry, ingots of silver will do no more to satisfy his hunger than clods of clay; much less will worldly abundance satisfy spiritual desires; he that has ever so much silver, covets more, not only of that, but of something else, something of another nature. They that make themselves drudges to the world are spending their labour for that which satisfies not, (Isa. 55. 2.) which fills the belly, but will never fill the soul, Ezek. 7. 19.

2. The more men have, the more occasion they have for it, and the more they have to do with it, so that it is as broad as long; when goods increase, they are increased that eat them, v. 11. The more meat, the more mouths. Does the estate thrive? And does not the family, at the same time, grow more numerous, and the children grow up to need more? The more men have, the better house they must keep, the more servants they must employ, the more guests they must entertain, the more they must give to the poor, and the more they will have hanging on them, for where the carcase is, the eagles will be. What we have, more than food and raiment, we have for others; and then what good is there to the owners themselves, but the pleasure of beholding them with their eyes? And a poor pleasure it is: an empty speculation is all the difference between the owners and the sharers; the owner sees that as his own, which those about him enjoy as much of the real benefit of as he; only he has the satisfaction of doing good to others, which indeed is a satisfaction to one who believes what Christ said, that it is more blessed to give than to receive; but to a covetous man, who thinks all lost that goes beside himself, it is a constant vexation to see others eat of his increase.

3. The more men have, the more care they have about it, which perplexes them, and disturbs their repose; (v. 12.) refreshing sleep is as much the support and comfort of this life as food is. Now, (1.) Those commonly sleep best that work hard, and have but what they work for; The sleep of the labouring man is sweet, not only because he has tired himself with his labour, which makes this sleep the more welcome to him, and makes him sleep soundly, but because he has little to fill his head with care about, and so break his sleep. His sleep is sweet, though he eat but little, and have but little to eat, for his weariness rocks him asleep; and, though he eat much, yet he can sleep well, for his labour gets him a good digestion. The sleep of the diligent Christian, and his long sleep, is sweet, for, having spent himself and his time in the service of God, he can cheerfully return to God, and repose in him as his Rest. (2.) Those that have every thing else often fail to secure a good night's sleep; either their eyes are held waking, or their sleeps are unquiet, and do not refresh them; and it is their abundance that breaks their sleep, and disturbs it; both the abundance of their care, (as that rich man's, who, when his ground brought forth plentifully, thought within himself, What shall I do? Luke, 12. 17.) and the abundance of what they eat and drink, which overcharges the heart, makes them sick, and so hinders their repose. Ahasuerus, after a banquet of wine, could not sleep; and perhaps consciousness of guilt, both in getting and using what they have, breaks their sleep as much as any thing; but God gives his beloved sleep.

4. The more men have, the more danger they are in, both of doing mischief, and of having mischief done them; (v. 13.) There is an evil, a sore evil, which Solomon himself had seen under the sun, in this lower world, this theatre of sin and woe—riches kept for the owners thereof, (who have been industrious to hoard them and keep them safe,) to their hurt, they had better have been without them. (1.) Their riches do them hurt, make them proud, secure, and in love with the world, draw away their hearts from God and duty, and make it very difficult for them to enter into the kingdom of heaven, nay, help to shut them out of it. (2.) They do hurt with their riches, which not only put them into a capacity of gratifying their own lusts, and living luxuriously, but give them an opportunity of oppressing others, and dealing hardly with them. (3.) Often they sustain hurt by their riches; they would not be envied, would not be robbed, if they were not rich. It is the fat beast that is led first to the slaughter. A very rich man (as one observes) has sometimes been excepted out of a general pardon, both as to life and estate, merely on account of his vast and overgrown estate; so riches often take away the life of the owners thereof, Prov. 1. 19.

5. The more men have, the more they have to lose, and perhaps they may lose it all, v. 14. Those riches that have been laid up with a great deal of pains, and kept with a great deal of care, perish by evil travail, by the very pains and care which they take to secure and increase them; many a one has ruined his estate by being over-solicitous to advance it, and make it more, and has lost all by catching at all. Riches are perishing things, and all our care about them cannot make them otherwise; they make themselves wings, and fly away. He that thought he should have made his son a gentleman leaves him a beggar; he begets a son, and brings him up in the prospect of an estate, but, when he dies, leaves it under a charge of debt as much as it is worth, so that there is nothing in his hand. This is a common case; estates that made a great shew do not prove what they seemed, but cheat the heir.

6. How much soever men have when they die, they must leave it all behind them; (v. 15, 16.) As he came forth of his mother's womb naked, so shall he return; only as his friends, when he came naked into the world, in pity to him, helped him with swaddling-clothes, so, when he goes out, they help him with grave-clothes, and that is all: see Job, 1. 21. Ps. 49. 17. This is urged as a reason why we should be content with such things as we have, 1 Tim. 6. 7. In respect of the body, we must go as we came, the dust shall return to the earth as it was; but sad is our case if the soul return as it came, for we were born in sin, and, if we die in sin unsanctified, we had better never been born; and that seems to be the case of the worldling here spoken of, for he is said to return in all points as he came, as sinful, as miserable, and much more so. This is a sore evil; he thinks it so, whose heart is glued to the world, that he shall take nothing of his labour which he may carry away in his hand; his riches will not go with him into another world, nor stand him in any stead there. If we labour in religion, the grace and comfort we get by that labour we may carry away in our hearts, and shall be the better for it to eternity; that is meat that endures: but, if we labour only for the world, to fill our hands with that, we cannot take that away with us; we are born with our hands griping, but die with them extended, letting go what we held fast. So that, upon the whole matter, he may well ask, What profit has he that has laboured for the wind?

Note, Those that labour for the world labour for the wind; for that which has more sound than substance, which is uncertain, and always shifting its point, unsatisfying, and often hurtful, which we cannot hold fast, and which, if we take up with it as our portion, will no more feed us than the wind, Hos. 12. 1. Men will see that they have laboured for the wind, when, at death, they find the profit of their labour is all gone, gone, like the wind, they know not whither.

7. Those that have much, if they set their hearts upon it, have not only uncomfortable deaths, but uncomfortable lives too, v. 17. This covetous worldling, that is so bent upon raising an estate, all his days he eats in darkness and much sorrow, and it is his sickness and wrath; he has not only no pleasure of his estate, nor any enjoyment of it himself, for he eats the bread of sorrow, (Ps. 127. 2.) but a great deal of vexation to see others eat of it. His necessary expenses make him sick, make him fret, and he seems as if he were angry that himself and those about him cannot live without meat. As we read the last clause, it intimates how ill this covetous worldling can bear the common and unavoidable calamities of human life; when he is in health, he eats in darkness, always dull with care and fear about what he has; but, if he be sick, he has much sorrow and wrath with his sickness; he is vexed that his sickness takes him off from his business, and hinders him in his pursuits of the world; vexed that all his wealth will not give him any ease or relief; but especially terrified with the apprehensions of death, (which his diseases are the harbingers of,) of leaving this world, and the things of it, behind him, which he has set his affections upon, and removing to a world he has made no preparation for. He has not any sorrow after a godly sort, does not sorrow to repentance, but he has sorrow and wrath, is angry at the providence of God, angry at his sickness, angry at all about him, fretful and peevish, which doubles his affliction, which a good man lessens and lightens by patience and joy in his sickness.

18. Behold that which I have seen: it is good and comely for one to eat and to drink, and to enjoy the good of all his labour that he taketh under the sun all the days of his life, which God giveth him: for it is his portion. 19. Every man also to whom God hath given riches and wealth, and hath given him power to eat thereof, and to take his portion, and to rejoice in his labour; this is the gift of God. 20. For he shall not much remember the days of his life; because God answereth him in the joy of his heart.

Solomon, from the vanity of riches hoarded up, here infers, that the best course we can take, is, to use well what we have, to serve God with it, to do good with it, and take the comfort of it to ourselves and our families; this he had pressed before, ch. 2. 24.—3. 22. Observe,

1. What it is that is here recommended to us; not to indulge the appetites of the flesh, or to take up with present pleasures or profits for our portion, but soberly and moderately to make use of what Providence has allotted for our comfortable passage through this world. We must not starve ourselves, either through covetousness, because we cannot afford ourselves food convenient, or through eagerness in our worldly pursuits, or through excessive care and grief, but eat and drink what is fit for us, to keep our bodies in good plight for the serving of our souls in God's service. We must not kill ourselves with labour, and then leave others to enjoy the good of it, but take the comfort of that which our hands have laboured for, and that not now and then, but all the days of our life which God gives us. Life is God's gift, and he has appointed us the number of the days of our life: (Job, 14. 5.) let us therefore spend those days in serving the Lord our God with joyfulness and gladness of heart. We must not do the business of our calling as a drudgery, and make ourselves slaves to it, but we must rejoice in our labour, not grasp at more business than we can go through without perplexity and disquiet, but take a pleasure in the calling wherein God has put us, and go on in the business of it with cheerfulness; this is to rejoice in our labour, whatever it is, as Zebulun in his going out, and Issachar in his tents.

2. What is urged to recommend it to us.

(1.) That it is good and comely to do this; it is well, and it looks well; they that cheerfully use what God has given them, thereby honour the Giver, answer the intention of the gift, act rationally and generously, do good in the world, and make what they have turn to the best account, and this is both their credit and their comfort; it is good and comely; there is duty and decency in it.

(2.) That it is all the good we can have out of the things of this world; it is our portion, and in doing thus we take our portion, and make the best of bad. This is our part of our worldly possessions; God must have his part, the poor their's, and our families their's, but this is our's, it is all that falls to our lot out of them.

(3.) That a heart to do thus is such a gift of God's grace as crowns all the gifts of his providence. If God has given a man riches and wealth, he completes the favour, and makes that a blessing indeed, if, withal, he gives him power to eat thereof, wisdom and grace to take the good of it, and to do good with it. If this is God's gift, we must covet it earnestly as the best gift relating to our enjoyments in this world.

(4.) That this is the way to make our own lives easy, and to relieve ourselves against the many toils and troubles which our lives on earth are incident to; (v. 20.) He shall not much remember the days of his life, the days of his sorrow and sore travail, his working days, his weeping days; he shall either forget them, or remember them as waters that pass away; he shall not much lay to heart his crosses, nor long retain the bitter relish of them, because God answers him in the joy of his heart, balances all the grievances of his labour with the joy of it, and recompenses him for it, by giving him to eat the labour of his hands. If he does not answer all his desires and expectations, in the letter of them, yet he answers them with that which is more than equivalent, in the joy of his heart. A cheerful spirit is a great blessing; it makes the yoke of our employments easy, and the burthen of our afflictions light.

CHAP. VI.

In this chapter, I. The royal preacher goes on further to shew the vanity of worldly wealth, when men place their happiness in it, and are eager and inordinate in laying it up. Riches, in the hands of a man that is wise and generous, are good for something; but, in the hands of a sordid, sneaking, covetous, miser, they are good for nothing. 1. He takes an account of the possessions and enjoyments which such a man may have. He has wealth, (v. 2.) he has children to inherit it, (v. 3.) and lives long, v. 3, 6. 2. He describes his folly in not taking the comfort of it; he has no power to eat of it, lets strangers devour it, is never filled with good, and, at last, has no burial, v. 2, 3. 3. He condemns it as an evil, a common evil, vanity, and a disease, v. 1, 2. 4. He prefers the condition of a still-born child before the condition of such a one, v. 3. The still-born child's infelicity is only negative, (v. 4, 5.) but that of the covetous worldling is positive; he lives a great while, to see himself miserable, v. 6. 5. He shews the vanity of riches, as pertaining only to the body, and giving no satisfaction to the mind, (v. 7, 8.) and of those boundless desires with which covetous people vex themselves, (v. 9.) which, if they be gratified ever so fully, leave a man but a man still, v. 10. II. He concludes this discourse, of the vanity of the creature, with this plain inference from the whole, That it is folly to think of making up a happiness for ourselves in the things of this world, v. 11, 12. Our satisfaction must be in another life, not in this.

1. THERE is an evil which I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men: 2. A man to whom God hath given riches, wealth, and honour, so that he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth, yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof, but a stranger eateth it: this is vanity, and it is an evil disease. 3. If a man beget an hundred children, and live many years, so that the days of his years be many, and his soul be not filled with good, and also that he have no burial; I say, that an untimely birth is better than he. 4. For he cometh in with vanity, and departeth in darkness, and his name shall be covered with darkness. 5. Moreover he hath not seen the sun, nor known any thing: this hath more rest than the other. 6. Yea, though he live a thousand years twice told, yet hath he seen no good: do not all go to one place!

Solomon had shewed, in the close of the foregoing chapter, how good it is to make a comfortable use of the gifts of God's providence; now here he shews the evil of the contrary, having, and not using, gathering to lay up for I know not what contingent emergencies to come, not to lay out on the most urgent occasions present; this is an evil which Solomon himself saw under the sun, v. 1. A great deal of evil there is under the sun; there is a world above the sun, where there is no evil, yet God causes his sun to shine upon the evil as well as upon the good, which is an aggravation of the evil. God has lighted up a candle for his servants to work by, but they bury their talent as slothful and unprofitable, and so waste the light, and are unworthy of it. Solomon, as a king, inspected the manners of his subjects, and took notice of this evil as a prejudice to the public, who are damaged, not only by men's prodigality on the one hand, but by their penuriousness on the other; as it is with the blood in the natural body, so it is with the wealth of the body politic; if, instead of circulating, it stagnates, it will be of ill consequence. Solomon, as a preacher, observed the evils that were done, that he might reprove them and warn people against them. This evil was, in his days, common, and yet then there was great plenty of silver and gold, which, one would think, should have made people less fond of riches; the times also were peaceable, nor was there any prospect of trouble, which to some is a temptation to hoard; but no providence will of itself, unless the grace of God work with it, cure the corrupt affection that is in the carnal mind to the world and the things of it; nay, when riches increase, we are most apt to set our hearts upon them. Now concerning this miser, observe,

I. The abundant reason he has to serve God with joyfulness and gladness of heart; how well God has done for him;

1. He has given him riches, wealth, and honour, v. 2. Note, (1.) Riches and wealth commonly gain people honour among men. Though it be but an image, if it be a golden image, all people, nations, and languages, will fall down, and worship it. (2.) Riches, wealth, and honour, are God's gifts, the gifts of his providence, and not given, as his rain and sunshine, alike to all, but to some, and not to others, as God sees fit. (3.) Yet they are given to many that do not make a good use of them, to many to whom God does not give wisdom and grace to take the comfort of them, and serve God with them. The gifts of common providence are bestowed on many to whom are denied the gifts of special grace without which the gifts of providence often do more hurt than good.

2. He wants nothing for his soul, of all that he desires. Providence has been so liberal to him, that he has as much as heart could wish, and more, Ps. 73. 7. He does not desire grace for his soul, the better part; all he desires, is, enough to gratify the sensual appetite, and that he has, his belly is filled with these hid treasures, Ps. 17. 14.

3. He is supposed to have a numerous family, to beget a hundred children, which are the stay and strength of his house, and as a quiver full of arrows to him, which are the honour and credit of his house, and in whom he has the prospect of having his name built up, and having all the immortality this world can give him. They are full of children, (Ps. 17. 14.) while many of God's people are written childless, and stript of all.

4. To complete his happiness, he is supposed to live many years, or rather many days, for our life is to be reckoned rather by days than years; the days of his years are many, and so healthful is his constitution, and so slowly does age creep upon him, that they are likely to be many more. Nay, he is supposed to live a thousand years twice told, a small part of which time, one would think, were enough to convince men, by their own experience, of the folly both of those that expect to find all good in worldly wealth, and of those that expect to find any good in it but in using it.

II. The little heart he has to use this which God gives him, for the ends and purposes for which it was given him. This is his fault and folly, that he renders not again according to the benefit done unto him, and serves not the Lord God, his Benefactor, with joyfulness and gladness of heart, in the abundance of all things: in the day of prosperity he is not joyful. Tristis es, et felix?—Art thou happy, yet sad? See his folly:

1. He cannot find in his heart to take the comfort of what he has himself. He has meat before him, he has wherewith to maintain himself and his family comfortably, but he has not power to eat thereof; his sordid niggardly temper will not suffer him to lay it out, no not upon himself, no not upon that which is most necessary for himself. He has not power to reason himself out of this absurdity, to conquer his covetous humour. He is weak indeed, who has not power to use what God gives him, for God gives him not that power, but withholds it from him, to punish him for his other abuses of his wealth; because he has not the will to serve God with it, God denies him the power to serve himself with it.

2. He suffers those to prey upon him, that he is under no obligations to; A stranger eateth it. This is the common fate of misers, they will not trust their own children, perhaps; but retainers and hangers on, that have the art of wheedling, insinuate themselves into them, and find ways of devouring what they have, or getting it to be left to them by their wills. God orders it so that a stranger eats it; strangers devour his strength, Hos. 7. 9. Prov. 5. 10. This may be well called vanity, and an evil disease. What we have we have in vain, if we do not use it; and that temper of mind is certainly a most wretched distemper, which keeps us from using it. Our worst diseases are those from the corruption of our own hearts.

3. He deprives himself of the good that he might have had of his worldly possessions; not only forfeits it, but robs himself of it, and throws it from him; His soul is not filled with good, v. 3. He is still unsatisfied and uneasy. His hands are filled with riches, his barns filled, and his bags filled, but his soul is not filled with good, no, not with that good, for it is still craving more. Nay, (v. 6.) he has not seen good, he cannot so much as please his eye, for that is still looking further, and looking with envy on those that have more. He has not even the sensible good of an estate. Though he looks not beyond the things that are seen, yet he looks not with any true pleasure even on them.

4. He has no burial, none agreeable to his rank, no decent burial, but the burial of an ass; either through the sordidness of his temper he will not allow himself a fashionable burial, but forbids it, or the strangers that have eaten him up leave him so poor, at last, that he has not wherewithal, or those to whom he leaves what he has have so little esteem for his memory, and are so greedy of what they are to have from him, that they will not be at the charges of burying him handsomely, which his own children, if he had left it to them, would not have grudged him.

III. The preference which the preacher gives to an untimely birth before him; An untimely birth, a child that is carried from the womb to the grave is better than he. Better is the fruit that drops from the tree before it is ripe, than that which is left to hang on till it is rotten. Job, in his passion, thinks the condition of an untimely birth better than his, when he was in adversity; (Job, 3. 16.) but Solomon here pronounces it better than the condition of a worldling in his greatest prosperity, when the world smiles upon him.

1. He grants the condition of an untimely birth, upon many accounts, to be very sad; (v. 4. 5.) He comes in with vanity, for, as to this world, he that is born, and dies immediately, was born in vain, and he departs in darkness, little or no notice is taken of him; being an abortive, he has no name, or, if he had, it would soon be forgotten and buried in oblivion, it would be covered with darkness, as the body is with the earth. Nay, (v. 5.) he has not seen the sun, but from the darkness of the womb he is hurried immediately to that of the grave, and, which is worse than not being known to any, he has not known any thing, and therefore has come short of that which is the greatest pleasure and honour of man. Those that live in wilful ignorance, and know nothing to purpose, are no better than an untimely birth that has not seen the sun, nor known any thing.

2. Yet he prefers it before that of a covetous miser; this untimely birth has more rest than the other, for this has some rest, but the other has none; this has no trouble and disquiet, but the other is in perpetual agitation, and has nothing but trouble, trouble of his own making. The shorter the life is, the longer the rest; and the fewer the days, and the less we have to do with this troublesome world, the less trouble we know.

'Tis better die a child at four,
Than live, and die so at fourscore.

The reason he gives why this has more rest, is, because all go to one place to rest in, and this is sooner at his rest, v. 6. He that lives a thousand years goes to the same place with the child that does not live an hour, ch. 3. 20. The grave is the place we shall all meet in. Whatever differences there may be in men's condition in this world, they must all die, are all under the same sentence, and, to outward appearance, their deaths are alike. The grave is, to one as well as another, a land of silence, of darkness, of separation from the living, and a sleeping-place. It is the common rendezvous of rich and poor, honourable and mean, learned and unlearned; the short-lived and long-lived meet in the grave, only one rides post thither, the other goes by a slower conveyance; the dust of both mingle, and lie undistinguished.

7. All the labour of man is for his mouth, and yet the appetite is not filled. 8. For what hath the wise more than the fool? what hath the poor, that knoweth to walk before the living? 9. Better is the sight of the eyes than the wandering of the desire: this is also vanity and vexation of spirit. 10. That which hath been is named already, and it is known that it is man: neither may he contend with him that is mightier than he.

The preacher here further shews the vanity and folly of heaping up worldly wealth, and expecting happiness in it.

1. How much soever we toil about the world, and get out of it, we can have for ourselves no more than a maintenance; (v. 7.) All the labour of man is for his mouth, which craves it of him; (Prov. 16. 26.) it is but food and raiment, what is more, others have, not we; it is all for the mouth; meats are but for the belly, and the belly for meats, there is nothing for the head and heart, nothing to nourish or enrich the soul. A little will serve to sustain us comfortably, and a great deal can do no more.

2. Those that have ever so much, are still craving; let a man labour ever so much for his mouth, yet the appetite is not filled. (1.) Natural desires are still returning, still pressing; a man may have feasted to-day, and yet hungry to-morrow. (2.) Worldly sinful desires are insatiable, ch. 5. 10. Wealth to a worldly man is like drink to one in a dropsy, which does but increase the thirst. Some read the whole verse thus; Though all a man's labour fall out to his own mind, (ori ejus obveniat—so as to correspond with his views, Juv.) just as himself would have it, yet his desire is not satisfied, still he has a mind to something more. (3.) The desires of the soul find nothing in the wealth of the world to give them any satisfaction. The soul is not filled, so the word is. When God gave Israel their request, he sent leanness into their souls, Ps. 106. 15. He was a fool, who, when his barns were full, said, Soul, take thine ease.

3. A fool may have as much worldly wealth, and may enjoy as much of the pleasure of it, as a wise man; nay, and perhaps not be so sensible of the vexation of it; What has the wise more than the fool? v. 8. Perhaps he has not so good an estate, so good a trade, nor such good preferment, as the fool has. Nay, suppose them to be equal in their possessions, what can a wise man, a scholar, a wit, a politician, squeeze out of his estate more than needful supplies? But a half-witted man may do this. A fool can fare as well and relish it, can dress as well, and make as good a figure in any public appearance, as a wise man; so that if there were not pleasures and honour peculiar to the mind, which the wise man has more than the fool, as to this world they would be upon a level.

4. Even a poor man, who has business, and is discreet, diligent and dexterous, in the management of it, may get as comfortably through this world as he that is loaded with an overgrown estate. Consider what the poor has less than the rich, if he but knows to walk before the living, knows how to conduct himself decently, and do his duty to all, how to get an honest livelihood by his labour, how to spend his time well, and improve his opportunities. What has he? Why, he is better beloved, and more respected, among his neighbours, and has a better interest, than many a rich man that is griping and haughty. What has he? Why he has as much of the comfort of this life, has food and raiment, and is therewith content, and so is as truly rich as he that has abundance.

5. The enjoyment of what we have cannot but be acknowledged more rational than a greedy grasping at more; (v. 9.) Better is the sight of the eyes, making the best of that which is present, than the wandering of the desire, the uneasy walking of the soul after things at a distance, and the affecting of a variety of imaginary satisfactions. He is much happier that is always content, though he has ever so little, than he that is always coveting, though he has ever so much. We cannot say, Better is the sight of the eyes than the fixing of the desire upon God, and the resting of the soul in him; it is better to live by faith in things to come than to live by sense, which dwells only upon present things; but better is the sight of the eyes than the roving of the desire after the world, and the things of it, than which nothing more uncertain nor more unsatisfying at the best. This wandering of the desire is vanity and vexation of spirit; it is vanity at the best; if what is desired be obtained, it proves not what we promised ourselves from it, but commonly the wandering desire is crossed and disappointed, and then it turns to vexation of spirit.

6. Our lot, whatever it is, is that which is appointed us by the counsel of God, which cannot be altered, and it is therefore our wisdom to reconcile ourselves to it, and cheerfully to acquiesce in it; (v. 10.) That which has been, or, as some read it, that which is, and so likewise that which shall be, is named already, it is already determined in the divine foreknowledge, and all our care and pains cannot make it otherwise than as it is fixed; Jaeta est alea—The die is cast; it is therefore folly to quarrel with that which will be as it is, and wisdom to make a virtue of necessity. We shall have what pleases God, and let that please us.

7. Whatever we attain to in this world, still we are but men, and the greatest possessions and preferments cannot set us above the common accidents of human life; That which has been, and is, that busy animal that makes such a stir and such a noise in the world, is named already; he that made him gave him his name, and it is known that it is man, that is his name by which he must know himself, and it is a humbling name, Gen. 5. 2. He called their name Adam; and all theirs have the same character, red earth. Though a man could make himself master of all the treasures of kings and provinces, yet he is a man still, mean, mutable, and mortal, and may at any time be involved in the calamities that are common to men. It is good for rich and great men to know and consider that they are but men, Ps. 9. 20. It is known that they are but men; let them put what face they will upon it, and, like the king of Tyre, set their heart as the heart of God, yet the Egyptians are men, and not gods, and it is known that they are so.

8. How far soever our desires wander, and how closely soever our endeavours keep pace with them, we cannot strive with the Divine Providence, but must submit to the disposals of it, whether we will or no. If it is man, he may not contend with him that is mightier than he; it is presumption to arraign God's proceedings, and to charge him with folly or iniquity; nor is it to any purpose to complain of him, for he is in one mind, and who can turn him? Elihu pacifies Job with this incontestable principle, That God is greater than man, (Job, 33. 12.) and therefore man may not contend with him, nor resist his judgments, when they come with commission. A man cannot with the greatest riches make his part good against the arrests of sickness or death, but must yield to his fate.

11. Seeing there be many things that increase vanity, what is man the better? 12. For who knoweth what is good for man in this life, all the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow? For who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun?

Here, 1. Solomon lays down his conclusion, which he had undertaken to prove, as that which was fully confirmed by the foregoing discourse; There be many things that increase vanity; the Life of man is vain, at the best, and there are abundance of accidents that concur to make it more so; even that which pretends to increase the wealth and pleasure, does but increase the vanity, and make it more vexatious.

2. He draws some inferences from it, which serve further to evince the truth of it.

(1.) That a man is never the nearer to true happiness for the abundance that he has in this world; What is man the better for his wealth and pleasure, his honour and preferment? What remains to man? What residuum has he, what overplus, what real advantage, when he comes to balance his accounts? Nothing that will do him any good, or turn to account.

(2.) That we do not know what to wish for, because that which we promise ourselves most satisfaction in, often proves most vexatious to us; Who knows what is good for a man in this life, where every thing is vanity, and any thing, even that which we most covet, may prove a calamity to us? Thoughtful people are in care to do every thing for the best, if they knew it; but as it is an instance of the corruption of our hearts, that we are apt to desire that as good for us which is really hurtful, as children that cry for knives to cut their fingers with; so is it an instance of the vanity of this world, that what, according to all probable conjectures, seems to be for the best, often proves otherwise; such is our short-sightedness concerning the issues and events of things, and such broken reeds are all our creature-confidences. We know not how to advise others for the best, nor how to act ourselves, because that which we apprehend likely to be for our welfare may become a trap.

(3.) That therefore our life upon earth is what we have no reason to take any great complacency in, or to be confident of the continuance of; it is to be reckoned by days, it is but a vain life, and we spend it as a shadow, so little is there in it substantial, so fleeting, so uncertain, so transitory, is it, and so little in it to be fond of, or to be depended on. If all the comforts of life be vanity, life itself can have no great reality in it, to constitute a happiness for us.

(4.) That our expectations from this world are as uncertain and deceitful as our enjoyments are. Since every thing is vanity, Who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun? He can no more please himself with the hopes of what shall be after him, to his children and family, than with the relish of what is with him, since he can neither foresee himself, nor can any one else foretell to him, what shall be after him; nor shall he have any intelligence sent him of it when he is gone; his sons come to honour, and he knows it not; so that, look which way we will, Vanity of vanity, all is vanity.

CHAP. VII.

Solomon had given many proofs and instances of the vanity of this world and the things of it; now, in this chapter, I. He recommends to us some good means proper to be used for the redress of these grievances, and the arming of ourselves against the mischief we are in danger of from them, that we may make the best of the bad. As, 1. Care of our reputation, v. 1. 2. Seriousness, v. 2..6. 3. Calmness of spirit, v. 7..10. 4. Prudence in the management of all our affairs, v. 11,12. 5. Submission to the will of God in all events, accommodating ourselves to every condition, v. 13..15. 6. A conscientious avoiding of all dangerous extremes, v. 16..18. 7. Mildness and tenderness toward those that have been injurious to us, v. 19..22. In short, the best way to sure ourselves from the vexation which the vanity of the world creates us, is, to keep our temper, and to maintain a strict government of our passions. II. He laments his own iniquity, as that which was more vexatious than any of these vanities, that mystery of iniquity, the having of many wives, by which he was drawn away from God and his duty, v. 23..29.

1. A GOOD name is better than precious ointment; and the day of death than the day of one's birth. 2. It is better to go to the house of mourning, than to go to the house of feasting: for that is the end of all men: and the living will lay it to his heart. 3. Sorrow is better than laughter: for by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better. 4. The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning; but the heart of fools is in the house of mirth. 5. It is better to hear the rebuke of the wise, than for a man to hear the song of fools. 6. For as the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of the fool: this also is vanity.

In these verses, Solomon lays down some great truths, which seem paradoxes to the unthinking part, that is, the far greatest part, of mankind.

I. That the honour of virtue is really more valuable and desirable than all the wealth and pleasure in this world; (v. 1.) A good name is before good ointment, so it may be read; it is preferable to it, and will be rather chosen by all that are wise. Good ointment is here put for all the profits of the earth, among the products of which oil was reckoned one of the most valuable, for all the delights of sense, for ointment and perfume, which rejoice the heart, and it is called the oil of gladness, nay, and for the highest titles of honour with which men are dignified, for kings are anointed. A good name is better than all riches; (Prov. 22. 1.) a name for wisdom and goodness with those that are wise and good—the memory of the just; this is a good that will bring a more grateful pleasure to the mind, will give a man a larger opportunity of usefulness, and will go further, and last longer, than the most precious box of ointment; for Christ paid Mary for her ointment with a good name, a name in the gospels, (Matth. 26. 13.) and we are sure he always pays with advantage.

II. That, all things considered, our going out of the world is a greater kindness to us than our coming into the world was; The day of death is preferable to the birth-day; though, as to others, there was joy when a child was born into the world, and where there is death, there is lamentation, yet, as to ourselves, if we have lived so as to merit a good name, the day of our death, which will put a period to our cares, and toils, and sorrows, and remove us to rest, and joy, and eternal satisfaction, is better than the day of our birth, which ushered us into a world of so much sin and trouble, vanity and vexation. We were born to uncertainty, but a good man does not die at uncertainty. The day of our birth clogged our souls with the burthen of the flesh, but the day of our death will set them at liberty from that burthen.

III. That it will do us more good to go to a funeral than to go to a festival; (v. 2.) It is better to go to the house of mourning, and there weep with them that weep, than to go to the house of feasting, to a wedding, or a wake, there to rejoice with them that do rejoice. It will do us more good, and make better impressions upon us. We may lawfully go to both, as there is occasion; our Saviour both feasted at the wedding of his friend in Cana, and wept at the grave of his friend in Bethany; and we may possibly both glorify God, and do good, and get good, in the house of feasting; but, considering how we are apt to be vain and frothy, proud and secure, and indulgent of the flesh, it is better for us to go to the house of mourning, not to see the pomp of the funeral, but to share in the sorrow of it, and to learn good lessons, both from the dead, who is going thence to his long home, and from the mourners, who go about the streets.

The uses to be gathered from the house of mourning, are, 1. By way of information; That is the end of all men; it is the end of man as to this world, a final period to his state here, he shall return no more to his house; it is the end of all men; all have sinned, and therefore death passes upon all; we must thus be left by our friends as the mourners are, and thus leave, as the dead do. What is the lot of others will be our's; the cup is going round, it will come to our turn to pledge it shortly. 2. By way of admonition: The living will lay it to his heart. Will they? It were well if they would; they that are spiritually alive will lay it to heart, and, as for all the survivors, one would think they should; it is their own fault if they do not; for nothing is more easy and natural than by the death of others to be put in mind of our own. Some perhaps will lay that to heart, and consider their latter end, who would not lay a good sermon to heart.

For the further proof of this, (v. 4.) he makes it the character, (1.) Of a wise man, that his heart is in the house of mourning; he is much conversant with mournful subjects; and it is both an evidence and a furtherance of his wisdom; the house of mourning is the wise man's school, where he has learned many a good lesson, and there, where he is serious, he is in his element. When he is in the house of mourning, his heart is there, to improve the spectacles of mortality that are presented to him; nay, when he is in the house of feasting, his heart is in the house of mourning, by way of sympathy with those that are in sorrow.

(2.) It is the character of a fool, that his heart is in the house of mirth; his heart is all upon it, to be merry and jovial, his whole delight is in sport and gaiety, in merry stories, merry songs, and merry company, merry days, and merry nights. If he be at any time in the house of mourning, he is under a restraint, his heart at the same time is in the house of mirth; this is his folly, and helps to make him more and more foolish.

IV. That gravity and seriousness better become us, and are better for us, than mirth and jollity, v. 3. The common proverb says, "An ounce of mirth is worth a pound of sorrow;" but the preacher teaches us a contrary lesson; Sorrow is better than laughter, more agreeable to our present state, where we are daily sinning, and suffering ourselves, more or less, and daily seeing the sins and sufferings of others. While we are in a vale of tears, we should conform to the temper of the climate: it is also more for our advantage, for by the sadness that appears in the countenance, the heart is often made better. Note, 1. That is best for us which is best for our souls, by which the heart is made better, though it be displeasing to sense. 2. Sadness is often a happy means of seriousness, and that affliction which is impairing to the health, estate, and family, may be improving to the mind, and make such impressions upon that, as may alter its temper very much for the better; may make it humble and meek, loose from the world, penitent for sin, and careful of duty. Vexatio dat intellectum—Vexation sharpens the intellect. Perissem nisi perissem—I had perished, if I had not been made wretched. It will follow, on the contrary, that by the mirth and frolicsomeness of the countenance the heart is made worse, more vain, carnal, sensual, and secure, more in love with the world, and more estranged from God and spiritual things, (Job, 21. 12, 14.) till it become utterly unconcerned in the afflictions of Joseph, as those, Amos, 6. 5, 6, and the king and Haman, Esth. 3. 15.

V. That it is much better for us to have our corruptions mortified by the rebuke of the wise than to have them gratified by the song of fools, v. 5. Many that would be very well pleased to hear the information of the wise, and much more to have their commendations and consolations, yet do not care for hearing their rebukes, that is, care not for being told of their faults, though ever so wisely; but therein they are no friends to themselves, for reproofs of instruction are the way of life, (Prov. 6. 23.) and though they be not so pleasant as the song of fools, they are more wholesome. To hear, not only with patience, but with pleasure, the rebuke of the wise, is a sign and means of wisdom; but to be fond of the song of fools, is a sign that the mind is vain, and is the way to make it more so. And what an absurd thing it is for a man to dote so much upon such a transient pleasure as the laughter of a fool is, which may fitly be compared to the burning of thorns under a pot, which makes a great noise, and a great blaze, for a little while, but is gone presently, scatters its ashes, and contributes scarcely any thing to the production of a boiling heat, for that requires a constant fire! The laughter of a fool is noisy and flashy, and is not an instance of true joy. This is also vanity, it deceives men to their destruction, for the end of that mirth is heaviness. Our blessed Saviour has read us our doom; Blessed are ye that weep now, for ye shall laugh; woe to you that laugh now, for ye shall mourn and weep, Luke, 6. 21, 25.

7. Surely oppression maketh a wise man mad: and a gift destroyeth the heart. 3. Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof: and the patient in spirit is better than the proud in spirit.

9. Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry: for anger resteth in the bosom of fools. 10. Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not inquire wisely concerning this.

Solomon had often complained before of the oppressions which he saw under the sun, which gave occasion for many melancholy speculations, and were a great discouragement to virtue and piety.

Now here,

I. He grants the temptation to be strong; (v. 7.) Surely, it is often too true, that oppression makes a wise man mad. If a wise man be much and long oppressed, he is very apt to speak and act unlike himself, to lay the reins on the neck of his passions, and break out into indecent complaints against God and man, or to make use of unlawful dishonourable means of relieving himself. The righteous, when the rod of the wicked rests long on their lot, are in danger of putting forth their hands to iniquity, Ps. 125. 3. When even wise men have unreasonable hardships put upon them, they have much ado to keep their temper, and to keep their place. It destroys the heart of a gift, so the latter clause may be read; even the generous heart that is ready to give gifts, and a gracious heart that is endowed with many excellent gifts, is destroyed by being oppressed. We should therefore make great allowances to those that are abused, and ill-dealt with, and not be severe in our censures of them, though they do not act so discreetly as they should; we know not what we should do if it were our own case.

II. He argues against it; let us not fret at the power and success of oppressors, nor be envious at them, for,

1. The character of oppressors is very bad, so some understand v. 7. If he that had the reputation of a wise man, becomes an oppressor, he becomes a mad man, his reason is departed from him, he is no better than a roaring lion and a ranging bear, and the gifts, the bribes, he takes, the gains he seems to reap by his oppressions, do but destroy his heart, and quite extinguish the poor remains of sense and virtue in him, and therefore he is rather to be pitied than envied; let him alone, and he will act so foolishly, and drive so furiously, that in a little time he will ruin himself.

2. The issue, at length, will be good; Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof; by faith see what the end will be, and with patience expect it. When proud men begin to oppress their poor honest neighbours, they think their power will bear them out in it, they doubt not but to carry the day, and gain the point; but it will prove better in the end than it seemed in the beginning, their power will be broken, their wealth gotten by oppression will be wasted and gone, they will be humbled and brought down, and reckoned with for their injustice, and oppressed innocency will be both relieved and recompensed. Better was the end of Moses's treaty with Pharaoh, that proud oppressor, when Israel was brought forth with triumph, than the beginning of it, when the tale of bricks was doubled, and every thing looked discouraging.

He arms us against it with some necessary directions. If we would not be driven mad by oppression, but preserve the possession of our own souls,

1. We must be clothed with humility; for the proud in spirit are they that cannot bear to be trampled upon, but grow outrageous, and fret themselves, when they are hardly bested; that will break a proud man's heart which will not break a humble man's sleep. Mortify pride, therefore, and a lowly spirit will easily be reconciled to a low condition.

2. We must put on patience; bearing patience, to submit to the will of God in the affliction, and waiting patience, to expect the issue in God's due time. The patient in spirit are here opposed to the proud in spirit, for where there is humility, there will be patience; those will be thankful for any thing, who own they deserve nothing at God's hand; and the patient are said to be better than the proud, they are more easy to themselves, more acceptable to others, and more likely to see a good issue of their troubles.

3. We must govern our passion with wisdom and grace; (v. 9.) Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry; those that are hasty in their expectations, and cannot brook delays, are apt to be angry if they be not immediately gratified; "Be not angry at proud oppressors, or any that are the instruments of your trouble." (1.) "Be not soon angry, not quick in apprehending an affront, and resenting it, nor forward to express your resentments of it." (2.) "Be not long angry;" for though anger may come into the bosom of a wise man, and pass through it as a way-faring man, it rests only in the bosom of fools, there it resides, there it remains, there it has the innermost and uppermost place, there it is hugged as that which is dear, and laid in the bosom, and not easily parted with. He therefore that would approve himself so wise as not to give place to the Devil, must not let the sun go down upon his wrath, Eph. 4. 26, 27.

4. We must make the best of that which is; (v. 10.) "Take it not for granted that the former days were better than these, nor inquire what is the cause that they were so, for therein thou dost not inquire wisely, since thou inquirest into the reason of the thing before thou art sure that the thing itself is true; and besides, thou art so much a stranger to the times past, and such an incompetent judge even of the present times, that thou canst not expect a satisfactory answer to the inquiry, and therefore thou dost not inquire wisely; nay, the supposition is a foolish reflection upon the providence of God in the government of the world." Note, (1.) It is folly to cry out of the badness of our own times, when we have more reason to cry out of the badness of our own hearts, (if men's hearts were better, the times would mend,) and when we have more reason to be thankful that they are not worse, but that even in the worst of times we enjoy many mercies, which help to make them not only tolerable, but comfortable. (2.) It is folly to cry up the goodness of former times, so as to derogate from the mercy of God to us in our own times; as if former ages had not the same things to complain of that we have, or if, perhaps, in some respects, they had not, yet as if God had been unjust and unkind to us in casting our lot in an iron age, compared with the golden ages that went before us; this arises from nothing but fretfulness and discontent, and an aptness to pick quarrels with God himself. We are not to think there is any universal decay in nature, or degeneracy in morals; God has been always good, and men always bad; and if, in some respects, the times are now worse than they have been, perhaps, in other respects, they are better.

11. Wisdom is good with an inheritance: and by it there is profit to them that see the sun. 12. For wisdom is a defence, and money is a defence; but the excellency of knowledge is, that wisdom giveth life to them that have it. 13. Consider the work of God: for who can make that straight which he hath made crooked? 14. In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider: God also hath set the one over-against the other, to the end that man should find nothing after him. 15. All things have I seen in the days of my vanity: there is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there is a wicked man that prolongeth his life in his wickedness. 16. Be not righteous over-much, neither make thyself over-wise: why shouldst thou destroy thyself? 17. Be not over-much wicked, neither be thou foolish: why shouldst thou die before thy time? 18. It is good that thou shouldst take hold of this; yea, also from this withdraw not thine hand: for he that feareth God shall come forth of them all. 19. Wisdom strengtheneth the wise more than ten mighty men which are in the city. 20. For there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not. 21. Also take no heed unto all words that are spoken; lest thou hear thy servant curse thee: 22. For oftentimes also thine own heart knoweth that thou thyself likewise hast cursed others.

Solomon, in these verses, recommends wisdom to us as the best antidote against those distempers of mind, which we are liable to, by reason of the vanity and vexation of spirit that there are in the things of this world.

Here are some of the praises and the precepts of wisdom.

1. The praises of wisdom. Many things are here said, in its commendation, to engage us to get and retain wisdom.

1. Wisdom is necessary to the right managing and improving of our worldly possessions; Wisdom is good with an inheritance: an inheritance is good for little without wisdom. Though a man have a great estate, though it come easily to him, by descent from his ancestors, if he have not wisdom to use it for the end for which he has it, he had better have been without it. Wisdom is not only good for the poor, to make them content and easy, but it is good for the rich too, good with riches to keep a man from getting hurt by them, and to enable a man to do good with them. Wisdom is good of itself, and makes a man useful; but if he have a good estate with it, that will put him into a greater capacity of being useful, and with his wealth he may be more serviceable to his generation, than he could have been without it; he will also make friends to himself, Luke, 16. 9. Wisdom is as good as an inheritance, yea, better too, so the margin reads it; it is more our own, more our honour, will make us greater blessings, will remain longer with us, and turn to a better account.

2. It is of great advantage to us throughout the whole course of our passage through this world; by it there is real profit to them that see the sun, both to those that have it, and to their contemporaries. It is pleasant to see the sun, (ch. 11. 7.) but that pleasure is not comparable to the pleasure of wisdom. The light of this world is an advantage to us in doing the business of this world; (John, 11. 9.) but to them that have that advantage, unless withal they have wisdom wherewith to manage their business, that advantage is worth little to them. The clearness of the eye of the understanding is of greater use to us than bodily eye-sight.

3. It contributes much to our safety, and is a shelter to us from the storms of trouble, and its scorching heat; it is a shadow, so the word is, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. Wisdom is a defence, and money, that is, as money is a defence. As a rich man makes his wealth, so a wise man makes his wisdom, a strong city. In the shadow of wisdom, (so the words run,) and in the shadow of money, there is safety. He puts wisdom and money together, to confirm what he had said before, that wisdom is good with an inheritance. Wisdom is as a wall, and money may serve as a thorn-hedge, which protects the field.

4. It is joy and true happiness to a man. This is the excellency of knowledge, divine knowledge, not only above money, but above wisdom too, human wisdom, the wisdom of this world, that it gives life to them that have it. The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and that is life, it prolongs life. Men's wealth exposes their lives, but their wisdom protects them. Nay, whereas wealth will not lengthen out the natural life, true wisdom will give spiritual life, the earnest of eternal life; so much better is it to get wisdom than gold!

5. It will put strength into a man, and be his stay and support; (v. 19.) Wisdom strengthens the wise, strengthens their spirits, and makes them bold and resolute, by keeping them always on sure grounds; it strengthens their interest, and gains them friends and reputation; it strengthens them for their services under their sufferings, and against the attacks that are made upon them, more than ten mighty men, great commanders, strengthen the city. They that are truly wise and good are taken under God's protection, and are safer there than if ten of the mightiest men in the city, men of the greatest power and interest, should undertake to secure them, and become their patrons.

II. Some of the precepts of wisdom, that wisdom which will be of so much advantage to us.

1. We must have an eye to God and to his hand in every thing that befalls us; (v. 13.) Consider the work of God. To silence our complaints concerning cross events, let us consider the hand of God in them, and not open our mouths against that which is his doing; let us look upon the disposal of our condition and all the circumstances of it as the work of God, and consider it as the product of his eternal counsel, which is fulfilled in every thing that befalls us. Consider that every work of God is wise, just, and good, and there is an admirable beauty and harmony in his works, and all will appear, at last, to have been for the best. Let us therefore give him the glory of all his works concerning us, and study to answer his designs in them. Consider the work of God, as that which we cannot make any alteration of. Who can make that straight which he has made crooked? Who can change the nature of things from what is settled by the God of nature? If he speak trouble, who can make peace? And if he hedge up the way with thorns, who can get forward? If desolating judgments go forth with commission, who can put a stop to them? Since therefore we cannot mend God's work, we ought to make the best of it.

We must accommodate ourselves to the various dispensations of Providence, that respect us, and do the work and duty of the day in its day, v. 14. Observe,

(1.) How the appointments and events of Providence are counterchanged. In this world, at the same time, some are in prosperity, others are in adversity; the same persons, at one time, are in great prosperity, at another time, in great adversity; nay, one event prosperous, and another grievous, may occur to the same person at the same time; both come from the hand of God, out of his mouth both evil and good proceed, (Isa. 14. 7.) and he has set the one over against the other, so that there is a very short and easy passage between them, and they are a foil to each other; day and night, summer and winter, are set the one over against the other, that in prosperity we may rejoice as though we rejoiced not, and in adversity may weep as though we wept not, for we may plainly see the one from the other, and quickly exchange the one for the other; and it is to the end that man may find nothing after him, that he may not be at any certainty concerning future events, or the continuance of the present scene, but may live in a dependence upon Providence, and be ready for whatever happens. Or, that man may find nothing in the word of God which he can pretend to amend.

(2.) How we must comply with the will of God, in events of both kinds. Our religion, in general, must be the same in all conditions, but the particular instances and exercises of it must vary, as our outward condition does, that we may walk after the Lord. [1.] In a day of prosperity, (and it is but a day,) we must be joyful, be in good, be doing good, and getting good, maintain a holy cheerfulness, and serve the Lord with gladness of heart in the abundance of all things. "When the world smiles, rejoice in God, and praise him, and let the joy of the Lord be thy strength." [2.] In a day of adversity, (and that is but a day too,) consider. Times of affliction are proper times for consideration, then God calls to consider, (IIag. 1. 5.) then, if ever, we are disposed to it, and no good will be gotten by the affliction without it. We cannot answer God's end in afflicting us, unless we consider why and wherefore he contends with us. And consideration is necessary also to our comfort and support under our afflictions.

3. We must not be offended at the greatest prosperity of wicked people, nor at the saddest calamities that may befall the godly in this life, v. 15. Wisdom will teach us how to construe those dark chapters of Providence, so as to reconcile them with the wisdom, holiness, goodness, and faithfulness, of God. We must not think it strange; Solomon tells us there were instances of this kind in his time; "All things have I seen in the days of my vanity; I have taken notice of all that passed, and this has been as surprising and perplexing to me as any thing." Observe, Though Solomon was so wise and great a man, yet he calls the days of his life the days of his vanity, for the best days on earth are so, in comparison with the days of eternity. Or perhaps he refers to the days of his apostacy from God, (those were indeed the days of his vanity,) and reflects upon this as one thing that tempted him to infidelity, or, at least, to indifferency in religion, that he saw just men perishing in their righteousness, that the greatest piety would not secure men from the greatest afflictions by the hand of God, nay, and sometimes did expose men to the greatest injuries from the hands of wicked and unreasonable men. Naboth perished in his righteousness, and Abel long before. He had also seen wicked men prolonging their lives in their wickedness; they live, become old, yea, and are mighty in power; (Job, 21. 7.) by their fraud and violence they screen themselves from the sword of justice. "Now, in this, consider the work of God, and let it not be a stumbling-block to thee." The calamities of the righteous are preparing them for their future blessedness, and the wicked, while their days are prolonged, are but ripening for ruin. There is a judgment to come, which will rectify this seeming irregularity, to the glory of God and the full satisfaction of all his people, and we must wait with patience till then.

4. Wisdom will be of use both for caution to saints in their way, and for a check to sinners in their way.

(1.) As to saints, it will engage them to proceed and persevere in their righteousness, and yet will be an admonition to them to take heed of running into extremes; A just man may perish in his righteousness, but let him not, by his own imprudence and rash zeal, pull trouble upon his own head, and then reflect upon Providence as dealing hardly with him; (v. 16.) "Be not righteous over-much. In the acts of righteousness, govern thyself by the rules of prudence, and be not transported, no not by a zeal for God, into any intemperate heats or passions, or any practices unbecoming thy character, or dangerous to thine interests." Note, There may be over-doing in well-doing. Self-denial and mortification of the flesh are good; but if we prejudice our health by it, and unfit ourselves for the service of God, we are righteous over-much. To reprove those that offend, is good, but to cast that pearl before swine, who will turn again and read us, is to be righteous over-much. "Make not thyself over-wise; be not opinionative, and conceited of thine own abilities; set not up for a dictator, nor pretend to give law to, and give judgment upon, all about thee; set not up for a critic, to find fault with every thing that is said and done, nor busy thyself in other men's matters; as if thou knewest every thing, and couldst do any thing. Why shouldst thou destroy thyself, as fools often do by meddling with strife that belongs not to them. Why shouldst thou provoke authority, and run thyself into the briers, by needless contradictions, and by going out of thy sphere to correct what is amiss. Be wise as serpents, beware of men."

(2.) As to sinners, if it cannot prevail with them to forsake their sins, yet it may restrain them from growing very exorbitant. It is true, there is a wicked man that prolongs his life in his wickedness; (v. 15.) but let none say, therefore they may safely be as wicked as they will; no, be not over-much wicked, (v. 17.) do not run to an excess of riot. Many that will not be wrought upon by the fear of God, and a dread of the torments of hell, to avoid all sin, will yet, if they have ever so little consideration, avoid those sins that ruin their health and estate, and expose them to public justice. And Solomon here makes use of these considerations. "The magistrate bears not the sword in vain, has a quick eye and a heavy hand, and is a terror to evil-doers; therefore be afraid of coming within his reach, be not so foolish as to lay thyself open to the law, why shouldst thou die before thy time?" Solomon, in these two cautions, had probably a special regard to some of his own subjects that were disaffected to his government, and were meditating the revolt which they made immediately after his death. Some, it may be, quarreled with the sins of their governor, and made that their pretence; to them he says, Be not righteous over-much. Others were weary of the strictness of the government, and the temple-service, and that made them desirous to set up another king; but he frightens both from their seditious practices with the sword of justice, and others likewise from meddling with them that were given to change.

5. Wisdom will direct us in the mean between two extremes, and keep us always in the way of our duty, which we shall find a plain and safe way; (v. 18.) "It is good that thou shouldst take hold of this, this wisdom, this care, not to run thyself into snares; yea, also from this withdraw not thine hand, never slacken thy diligence, nor abate thy resolution to maintain a due decorum, and a good government of thyself; take hold of the bridle by which thy head-strong passions must be held in from hurrying thee into one mischief or other, as the horse and mule that have no understanding; and, having taken hold of it, keep thine hold, and withdraw not thine hand from it, for if thou do, the liberty that they will take will be as the letting forth of water, and thou wilt not easily recover thy hold again. Be conscientious, and yet be cautious, and to this exercise thyself. Govern thyself steadily by the principles of religion, and thou shalt find, that he that fears God shall come forth out of all those straits and difficulties which they run themselves into that cast off that fear." The fear of the Lord is that wisdom which will serve as a clue to extricate us out of the most intricate labyrinths. Honesty is the best policy. They that truly fear God have but one end to serve, and therefore act steadily. God has likewise promised to direct those that fear him, and to order their steps not only in the right way, but out of every dangerous way, Ps. 37. 23, 24.

6. Wisdom will teach us how to conduct ourselves in reference to the sins and offences of others, which commonly contribute more than any thing else to the disturbance of our repose, which contract both guilt and grief.

(1.) Wisdom teaches us not to expect that those we deal with should be faultless; we ourselves are not so, none are so, no not the best. This wisdom strengthens the wise as much as any thing, and arms them against the danger that arises from provocation, (v. 19.) so that they are not put into disorder by it; they consider that those they have dealings and conversation with are not incarnate angels, but sinful sons and daughters of Adam, even the best are so, insomuch that there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not, v. 20. Solomon had this in his prayer, (1 Kings, 8. 46.) in his proverbs, (Prov. 20. 9.) and here in his preaching. Note, [1.] It is the character of just men, that they do good; for the tree is known by its fruits. [2.] The best men, and they that do most good, yet cannot say that they are perfectly free from sin: even those that are sanctified are not sinless. None that live on this side heaven live without sin; if we say, We have not sinned, we deceive ourselves. [3.] We sin even in our doing good; there is something defective, nay something offensive, in our best performances. That which, for the substance of it, is good, and pleasing to God, is not so well done as it should be, and omissions in duty are sins, as well as omissions of duty. [4.] It is only just men upon earth that are subject thus to sin and infirmity; the spirits of just men, when they are got clear of the body, are made perfect in holiness, (Heb. 12. 23.) and in heaven they do good, and sin not.

(2.) Wisdom teaches us not to be quicksighted, or quickscented, in apprehending and resenting affronts; but to wink at many of the injuries that are done us, and act as if we did not see them; (v. 21.) "Take no heed to all words that are spoken, set not thy heart to them; vex not thyself at men's peevish reflections upon thee, or suspicions of thee, but be as a deaf man that hears not; (Ps. 38. 13, 14.) be not solicitous or inquisitive to know what people say of thee; if they speak well of thee, it will feed thy pride, if ill, it will stir up thy passion; see therefore that thou approve thyself to God and thine own conscience, and then heed not what men say of thee. Hearkeners, we say, seldom hear good of themselves; if thou heed every word that is spoken, perhaps thou wilt hear thine own servant curse thee, when he thinks thou dost not hear him; thou wilt be told that he does, and perhaps told falsely, if thou have thine ear open to tale-bearers, Prov. 29. 12. Nay, perhaps it is true, and thou mayest stand behind the curtain, and hear it thyself, mayest hear thyself not only blamed and despised, but cursed, the worst said of thee, and wished to thee, and that by a servant, one of the meanest rank, of the abjects, nay, by thy own servant, who should be an advocate for thee, and protect thy good name, as well as thy other interests; perhaps it is a servant thou hast been kind to, and yet he requites thee thus ill: and this will vex thee, thou hadst better not have heard it. Perhaps it is a servant thou hast wronged, and dealt unjustly with, and though he dares not tell thee so, he tells others so, and tells God so, and then thine own conscience will join with him in the reproach, which will make it much more uneasy." The good names of the greatest lie much at the mercy even of the meanest. And perhaps there is a great deal more evil said of us than we think there is, and by those from whom we little expected it. But we do not consult our own repose, no, nor our credit, though we pretend to be jealous of it, if we take notice of every word that is spoken diminishingly of us; it is easier to pass by twenty such affronts than to avenge one.

(3.) Wisdom puts us in mind of our own faults; (v. 22.) "Be not enraged at those that speak ill of thee, or wish ill to thee; for oftentimes, in that case, if thou retire into thyself, thy own conscience will tell thee that thou thyself hast cursed others, spoken ill of them, and wished ill to them, and thou art paid in thine own coin." Note, When any affront or injury is done us, it is reasonable to examine our consciences, whether we have not done the same, or as bad, to others; and if, upon reflection, we find we have, we must take that occasion to renew our repentance for it, must justify God, and make use of it to qualify our own resentments. If we be truly angry with ourselves, as we ought to be, for backbiting and censuring others, we shall be the less angry with others for backbiting and censuring us. We must shew all meekness towards all men, for we ourselves were sometimes foolish, Tit. 3. 2, 3. Matth. 7. 1, 2. James, 3. 1, 2.

23. All this have I proved by wisdom: I said, I will be wise; but it was far from me. 24. That which is far off, and exceeding deep, who can find it out? 25. I applied mine heart to know, and to search, and to seek out wisdom, and the reason of things, and to know the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness: 26. And I find more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and her hands as bands: whoso pleaseth God shall escape from her; but the sinner shall be taken by her. 27. Behold, this have I found (saith the preacher) counting one by one, to find out the account: 28. Which yet my soul seeketh, but I find not: one man among a thousand have I found; but a woman among all those have I not found. 29. Lo, this only have I found, that God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions.

Solomon had hitherto been proving the vanity of the world, and its utter insufficiency to make men happy; now here he comes to shew the vileness of sin, and its certain tendency to make men miserable; and this, as the former, he proves from his own experience, and it was a dear-bought experience. He is here, more than any where in all this book, putting on the habit of a penitent. He reviews what he had been discoursing of already, and tells us that what he had said was what he knew, and was well assured of, and what he resolved to stand by; All this have I proved by wisdom, v. 23. Now here,

I. He owns and laments the deficiencies of his wisdom. He had wisdom enough to see the vanity of the world, and to experience that that would not make a portion for a soul; but, when he came to inquire further, he found himself at a loss, his eye was too dim, his line was too short, and though he discovered this, there were many other things which he could not prove by wisdom.

1. His searches were industrious. God had given him a capa city for knowledge above any; he set up with a great stock of wisdom; he had the largest opportunities of improving himself that ever any man had. And, (1.) He resolved, if it were possible, to gain his point; I said, I will be wise; he earnestly desired it as highly valuable, he fully designed it as that which he looked upon to be attainable, he determined not to sit down short of it, Prov. 18. 1. Many are not wise, because they never said they would be so, being indifferent to it; but Solomon set it up for the mark he aimed at. When he made trial of sensual pleasures, he still thought to acquaint his heart with wisdom, (ch. 2. 3.) and not to be diverted from the pursuits of that; but perhaps he did not find it so easy a thing as he imagined, to keep up his correspondence with wisdom, while he addicted himself so much to his pleasures. However, his will was good; he said, I will be wise. And that was not all, (2.) He resolved to spare no pains; (c. 25.) "I applied my heart; I and my heart turned every way, I left no stone unturned, no means untried, to compass what I had in view. I set myself to know, and to search, and to seek out, wisdom, to accomplish myself in all useful learning, philosophy, and divinity." If he had not thus closely applied himself to study, it had been but a jest for him to say, I will be wise; for those that will attain the end must take the right way. Solomon was a man of great quickness, and yet, instead of using that (with many) as an excuse for slothfulness, he pressed it upon himself as an inducement to diligence, and the easier he found it to master a good notion, the more intent he would be that he might be master of the more good notions. Those that have the best parts should take the greatest pains, as those that have the largest stock should trade most. He applied himself not only to know what lay on the surface, but to search what lay hid out of the common view and road; nor did he search a little way, and then give it over, because he did not presently find what he searched for, but he sought it out, went to the bottom of it; nor did he aim to know things only, but the reasons of things, that he might give an account of them.

2. Yet his success was not answerable or satisfying; "I said, I will be wise, but it was far from me, I could not compass it. After all, This only I know, that I know nothing, and the more I know, the more I see there is to be known, and the more sensible I am of my own ignorance. That which is far off, and exceeding deep, who can find it out?" He means God himself, his counsels and his works; when he searched into these, he presently found himself puzzled and run aground; he could not order his speech by reason of darkness. It is higher than heaven, what can he do? Job, 11. 8. Blessed be God, there is nothing which we have to do which is not plain and easy; the word is nigh us; (Prov. 8. 9.) but there is a great deal which we would wish to know, which is far off, and exceeding deep, among the secret things which belong not to us. And, probably, it is a culpable ignorance and error that Solomon here laments, that his pleasures, and the many amusements of his court, had blinded his eyes, and cast a mist before them, so that he could not attain to true wisdom, as he designed.

II. He owns and laments the instances of his folly, in which he had exceeded, as, in wisdom, he came short. Here is,

1. His inquiry concerning the evil of sin. He applied his heart to know the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness. Observe, (1.) The knowledge of sin is a difficult knowledge, and hard to be attained; Solomon took pains for it. Sin has many disguises with which it palliates itself, as being loath to appear sin, and it is very hard to strip it of these, and to see it in its true nature and colours. (2.) It is necessary to our repentance for sin, that we be acquainted with the evil of it, as it is necessary to the cure of a disease, to know its nature, causes, and malignity. St. Paul therefore valued the divine law, because it discovered sin to him, Rom. 7. 7. Solomon, who, in the days of his folly, had set his wits on work to invent pleasures, and sharpen them, and was ingenious in making provision for the flesh, now that God had opened his eyes, is as industrious to find out the aggravations of sin, and so to put an edge upon his repentance. Ingenious sinners should be ingenious penitents, and wit and learning, among the other spoils of the strong man armed, should be divided by the Lord Jesus. (3.) It well becomes penitents to say the worst they can of sin, for the truth is, we can never speak ill enough of it. Solomon here, for his further humiliation, desired to see more, [1.] Of the sinfulness of sin; that is it which he lays the greatest stress upon in this inquiry, to know the wickedness of folly; by which perhaps he means his own iniquity, the sin of uncleanness, for that was commonly called folly in Israel, Gen. 34. 7. Dent. 22. 21. Judg. 20. 6. 2 Sam. 13. 12. When he indulged himself in it, he made a light matter of it; but now he desires to see the wickedness of it, its great wickedness, so Joseph speaks of it, Gen. 39. 9. Or it may be taken there generally for all sin. Many extenuate their sins with this, They were folly; but Solomon sees wickedness in those follies; an offence to God, and a wrong to conscience; This is wickedness, Jer. 4. 18. Zech. 5. 8. [2.] Of the folly of sin; as there is a wickedness in folly, so there is a folly in wickedness, even foolishness and madness. Wilful sinners are fools and madmen; they act contrary both to right reason and to their true interest.

2. The result of this inquiry.

(1.) He now discovered more than ever of the evil of that great sin which he himself had been guilty of, the loving of many strange women; (1 Kings, 11. 1.) this is that which he here most feelingly laments, and in very pathetic expressions.

[1.] He found the remembrance of the sin very grievous. Oh how heavy did it lie upon his conscience, what an agony was he in upon the thought of it; the wickedness, the foolishness, the madness, that he had been guilty of! I find it more bitter than death. As great a terror seized him, in reflection upon it, as if he had been under the arrest of death. Thus do they that have their sins set in order before them by a sound conviction, cry out against them; they are bitter as gall, nay, bitter as death, to all true penitents. Uncleanness is a sin that is, in its own nature, more pernicious than death itself. Death may be made honourable and comfortable, but this sin can be no other than shame and pain, Prov. 5. 9, 11.

[2.] He had found the temptation to the sin very dangerous, and that it was extremely difficult, and next to impossible, for those that ventured into the temptation to escape the sin, and for those that had fallen into the sin to recover themselves by repentance. The heart of the adulterous woman is snares and nets; she plays her game to ruin souls with as much art and subtlety as ever any fowler used to take a silly bird. The methods such sinners use are both deceiving and destroying as snares and nets are. The unwary souls are enticed into them by the bait of pleasure, which they greedily catch at, and promise themselves satisfaction in; but they are taken before they are aware, and taken irrecoverably. Her hands are as hands, with which, under colour of fond embraces, she hold those fast, that she has seized; they are held in the cords of their own sin, Prov. 5. 22. Lust gets strength by being gratified, and its charms are more prevalent.

[3.] He reckoned it a great instance of God's favour to any man, if by his grace he has kept him from this sin; He that pleases God shall escape from her, shall be preserved either from being tempted to this sin, or from being overcome by the temptation. Those that are kept from this sin, must acknowledge it is God that keeps them, and not any strength or resolution of their own, must acknowledge it a great mercy; and they that would have grace, sufficient for them, to arm them against this sin, must be careful to please God in every thing, by keeping his ordinances, Lev. 18. 30.

[4.] He reckoned it a sin, that is as sore a punishment of other sins as a man can fall under in this life; The sinner shall be taken by her. First, Those that allow themselves in other sins, by which their minds are blinded, and their consciences debauched, are the more easily drawn to this. Secondly, It is just with God to leave them to themselves to fall into it. See Rom. 1. 26, 28. Eph. 4. 18, 19. Thus does Solomon, as it were, with horror, bless himself from the sin in which he had plunged himself.

(2.) He now discovered more than ever of the general corruption of man's nature. He runs up that stream to the fountain, & his father had done before him, on a like occasion; (Ps. 51. 5.) Behold, I was shapen in iniquity.

[1.] He endeavoured to find out the number of his actual transgressions; (v. 27.) "Behold, this have I found, this I hoped to have found, I thought I could have understood my errors, and have brought in a complete list, at least, of the heads of them; I thought I could have counted them one by one, and have found out the account." He desired to find them out as a penitent, that he might the more particularly acknowledge them; and, generally, the more particular we are in the confession of sin, the more comfort we have in the sense of the pardon; he desired it also, as a preacher, that he might the more particularly give warning to others. Note, A sound conviction of one sin will put us upon inquiring into the whole confederacy; and the more we see avails in ourselves, the more diligently we should inquire further into our own faults, that what we see not may be discovered to us, Job, 34. 32.

[2.] He soon found himself at a loss, and perceived that they were innumerable; (v. 28.) "which yet my soul seeks, I am still counting, and still desirous to find out the account, but I find not, I cannot count them all, nor find out the account of them to perfection. I still make new and amazing discoveries of the desperate wickedness that there is in my own heart," Jer. 17. 9, 10. Who can know it? Who can understand his errors? Who can tell how often he offends? Ps. 19. 12. He finds that if God enters into judgment with him, or he with himself, for all his thoughts, words, and actions, he is not able to answer for one of a thousand, Job, 9. 3. This he illustrates, by comparing the corruption of his own heart and life with the corruption of the world, where he scarcely found one good man among a thousand, nay, among all the thousand wives and concubines which he had, he did not find one good woman; "Even so," says he, "when I come to recollect and review my own thoughts, words, and actions, and all the passages of my life past, perhaps among those that were manly I might find one good among a thousand, and that was all, the rest even of those had some corruption or other in them." He found (v. 20.) that he had sinned even in doing good; but for those that were effeminate, that passed in the indulgence of his pleasures, they were all naught; in that part of his life there did not appear so much as one of a thousand good. In our hearts and lives there appears little good, at the best, but sometimes none at all. Doubtless, this is not intended as a censure of the female sex in general; it is probable that there have been, and are, more good women than good men; (Acts, 17. 4, 12.) he merely alludes to his own sad experience; and perhaps there may be this further in it, he does, in his proverbs, warn us against the snares both of the evil man and of the strange woman, Prov. 2. 12, 16.—4. 14.—5. 3. Now he had observed the ways of the evil women to be more deceitful and dangerous than those of the evil men, that it was more difficult to discover their frauds and elude their snares; and therefore he compares sin to an adulteress, (Prov. 9. 13.) and perceives he can no more find out the deceitfulness of his own heart than he can that of a strange woman, whose ways are moveable, that thou canst not know them.

[3.] He therefore runs up all the streams of actual transgression to the fountain of original corruption. The source of all the folly and madness that are in the world, is in man's apostasy from God, and his degeneracy from his primitive rectitude; (v. 29.) "Lo, this only have I found; when I could not find out the particulars, yet the gross account was manifest enough; it is as clear as the sun, that man is corrupted and revolted, and is not as he was made." Observe,

First, How man was made by the wisdom and goodness of God; God made man upright; Adam the first man, so the Chaldee. God made him, and he made him upright, such a one as he should be; being made a rational creature, he was, in all respects, such a one as a rational creature should be, upright, without any irregularity, one could find no fault in him; he was upright, determined to God only, in opposition to the many inventions which he afterward turned aside to. Man, as he came out of God's hands, was (as we may say) a little picture of his Maker, who is good and upright.

Secondly, How he was marred, and, in effect, unmade, by his own folly and badness; They have sought out many inventions; they, our first parents, or the whole race, all in general, and every one in particular. They have sought out great inventions, so some; inventions to become great as gods, Gen. 3. 5. Or, the inventions of the great ones, so some; of the angels that fell, the Magnates. Or, many inventions. Man, instead of resting in what God had found for him, was for seeking to mend himself, like the prodigal that left his father's house, to seek his fortune. Instead of being for one, he was for many; instead of being for God's institutions, he was for his own inventions. The law of his creation would not hold him, but he would be at his own disposal, and follow his own sentiments and inclinations. Vain man would be wise, wiser than his Maker; is giddy and unsettled in his pursuits, and therefore has many inventions. They that forsake God, wander endlessly. Men's actual transgressions are multiplied. Solomon could not find out how many they are; (v. 28.) but he found they were very many. Many kinds of sins, and those often repeated; they are more than the hairs on our heads, Ps. 40. 12.

CHAP. VIII.

Solomon, in this chapter, comes to recommend wisdom to us, as the most powerful antidote against both the temptations and vexations that arise from the vanity of the world. Here is, I. The benefit and praise of wisdom, v. 1. II. Some particular instances of wisdom prescribed to us. 1. We must keep in due subjection to the government God has set over us, v. 2. 5. 2. We must get ready for sudden evils, and especially for sudden death, v. 6. 8. 3. We must arm ourselves against the temptation of an oppressive government, and not think it strange, v. 9. 10. The impunity of oppressors makes them more daring, (v. 11.) but in the issue it will be well with the righteous and ill with the wicked; (v. 12, 13.) and therefore the present prosperity of the wicked and afflictions of the righteous ought not to be a stumbling-block to us, v. 14. 4. We must cheerfully use the gifts of God's providence, v. 15. 5. We must with an entire satisfaction acquiesce in the will of God, and, not pretending to find the bottom, we must humbly and silently adore the depth of his unsearchable counsels, being assured they are all wise, just, and good, v. 16, 17.

1. WHO is as the wise man? and who knoweth the interpretation of a thing? A man's wisdom maketh his face to shine, and the boldness of his face shall be changed. 2. I counsel thee to keep the king's commandment, and that in regard of the oath of God. 3. Be not hasty to go out of his sight: stand not in an evil thing; for he doeth whatsoever pleaseth him. 4. Where the word of a king is, there is power: and who may say unto him, What doest thou? 5. Whoso keepeth the commandment shall feel no evil thing: and a wise man's heart discerneth both time and judgment.

Here is,

I. An encomium of wisdom, (v. 1.) that is, of true piety, guided in all its exercises by prudence and discretion. The wise man is the good man, that knows God, and glorifies him, knows himself, and does well for himself; his wisdom is a great happiness to him; for,

1. It advances him above his neighbours, and makes him more excellent than they; Who is as the wise man? Note, Heavenly wisdom will make a man an incomparable man. No man without grace, though he be learned, or noble, or rich, is to be compared with a man that has true grace, and is therefore accepted of God.

2. It makes him useful among his neighbours, and very serviceable to them; Who but the wise man knows the interpretation of a thing, understands the times and the events of them, and their critical junctures, so as to direct what Israel ought to do? 1 Chron. 12. 32.

3. It beautifies a man in the eyes of his friends; it makes his face to shine, as Moses's did when he came down from the mount; it puts honour upon a man, and a lustre on his whole conversation, makes him to be regarded and taken notice of, and gains him respect; (as Job, 29. 7, &c.) it makes him lovely and amiable, and the darling and blessing of his country; The strength of his face, the sourness and severity of his countenance, (so some understand the last clause,) shall be changed by it into that which is sweet and obliging. Even those whose natural temper is rough and morose, by wisdom are strangely altered, they become mild and gentle, and learn to look pleasant.

4. It imboldens a man against his adversaries, their attempts, and their scorn; The boldness of his face shall be doubled by wisdom; it will add very much to his courage in maintaining his integrity, when he not only has an honest cause to plead, but by his wisdom knows how to manage it, and where to find the interpretation of a thing. He shall not be ashamed, but shall speak with his enemy in the gate.

II. A particular instance of wisdom pressed upon us, and that is, subjection to authority, and a dutiful and peaceable perseverance in our allegiance to the government which Providence has set over us. Observe,

1. How the duty of subjects is here described:

(1.) We must be observant of the laws. In all those things wherein the civil power is to interpose, whether legislative or judicial, we ought to submit to its order and constitutions; I counsel thee; it may as well be supplied, I charge thee, not only as a prince but as a preacher; he might do both; "I recommend it to thee as a piece of wisdom; I say, whatever those say that are given to change, keep the king's commandment; wherever the sovereign power is lodged, be subject to it. Observe the mouth of a king," (so the phrase is,) "say as he says, do as he bids thee; let his word be a law, or rather let the law be his word." Some understand the following clause as a limitation of this obedience; "Keep the king's commandment, yet so as to have a regard to the cath of God, so as to keep a good conscience, and not to violate thy obligations to God, which are prior and superior to thine obligations to the king. Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, but so as to reserve pure and entire to God the things that are his."

(2.) We must not be forward to find fault with the public administration, or quarrel with every thing that is not just according to our mind, nor quit our post of service under the government, and throw it up, upon every discontent; (v. 3.) "Be not hasty to go out of his sight, when he is displeased at thee, (ch. 10. 4.) or when thou art displeased at him; fly not off in a passion, nor entertain such jealousies of him as will tempt thee to renounce the court, or forsake the kingdom." Solomon's subjects, as soon as his head was laid low, went directly contrary to this rule, when, upon the rough answer which Rehoboam gave them, they were hasty to go out of his sight, would not take time for second thoughts, nor admit proposals of accommodation, but cried, To your tents, O Israel. "There may perhaps be a just cause for to go out of his sight; but be not hasty to do it, act with great deliberation."

(3.) We must not persist in a fault when it is shewed us; "Stand not in an evil thing; in any offence thou hast given to thy prince, humble thyself, and do not justify thyself, for that will make the offence much more offensive. In any ill design thou hast, upon some discontent, conceived against thy prince, do not proceed in it; but if thou hast done foolishly in lifting up thyself, or hast thought evil, lay thy hand upon thy mouth," Prov. 30. 32. Note, Though we may by surprise be drawn into an evil thing, yet we must not stand in it, but recede from it as soon as it appears to us to be evil.

(4.) We must prudently accommodate ourselves to our opportunities, both for our own relief, if we think ourselves wronged, and for the redress of public grievances; A wise man's heart discerns both time and judgment; (v. 5.) it is the wisdom of subjects, in applying themselves to their prince, to inquire and consider both at what season, and in what manner, they may do it best and most effectually, to pacify his anger, obtain his favour, or obtain the revocation of any grievous measure prescribed. Esther, in dealing with Ahasuerus, took a deal pains to discern both time and judgment, and it sped accordingly. This may be taken as a general rule of wisdom, that every thing should be well-timed; and our enterprises are then likely to succeed, when we embrace the exact opportunity for them.

2. What arguments are here used to engage us to be subject to the higher powers; they are much the same with those which St. Paul uses, Rom. 13. 1, &c.

(1.) We must needs be subject, for conscience-sake, and that is the most powerful principle of subjection; we must be subject because of the oath of God, the oath of allegiance, which we have taken to be faithful to the government; the covenant between the king and the people, 2 Chron. 23. 16. David made a covenant, or contract, with the elders of Israel, though he was king by divine designation, 1 Chron. 11. 3. "Keep the king's commandments, for he has sworn to rule thee in the fear of God, and thou hast sworn, in that fear, to be faithful to him." It is called the oath of God, because he is a Witness to it, and will avenge the violation of it.

(2.) For wrath's sake; because of the sword which the prince bears, and the power he is intrusted with, which make him very formidable; He does whatsoever pleases him; he has a great authority, and a great ability to support that authority; (v. 4.) Where the word of a king is, giving orders to seize a man, there is power; there are many that will execute his orders, which makes the wrath of a king, or supreme government, like the roaring of a lion, and like messengers of death. Who may say unto him, What doest thou? He that contradicts him, does it at his peril. Kings will not bear to have their orders disputed, but expect they should be obeyed. In short, it is dangerous contending with sovereignty, and what many have repented. A subject is an unequal match for a prince. He may command me, who has legions at command.

(3.) For the sake of our own comfort; Whoso keeps the commandment, and lives a quiet and peaceable life, shall feel no evil thing; to which that of the apostle answers, (Rom. 13. 3.) Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power of the king? Do that which is good, as becomes a dutiful and loyal subject, and thou shalt, ordinarily, have praise of the same. He that does no ill, shall feel no ill, and needs fear none.

6. Because to every purpose there is time and judgment, therefore the misery of man is great upon him. 7. For he knoweth not that which shall be: for who can tell him when it shall be? 8. There is no man that hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit; neither hath he power in the day of death; and there is no discharge in that war; neither shall wickedness deliver those that are given to it.

Solomon had said, (v. 5.) that a wise man's heart discerns time and judgment; a man's wisdom will go a great way, by the blessing of God, in moral prognostications; but here he shews that few have that wisdom, and that even the wisest may yet be surprised by a calamity which they had not any foresight of, and therefore it is our wisdom to expect, and prepare for, sudden changes. Observe,

1. All the events concerning us, with the exact time of them, are determined and appointed in the counsel and foreknowledge of God, and all in wisdom; To every purpose there is a time prefixed, and it is the best time, for it is time and judgment, time appointed both in wisdom and righteousness; the appointment is not chargeable with folly or iniquity.

2. We are very much in the dark concerning future events, and the time and season of them; Man knows not that which shall be himself; and who can tell him when or how it shall be? v. 7. It cannot either be foreseen by him, or foretold to him; the stars cannot foretell a man what shall be, nor any of the arts of divination; God has, in wisdom, concealed from us the knowledge of future events, that we may be always ready for changes.

3. It is our great unhappiness and misery, that, because we cannot foresee an evil, we know not how to avoid it, or guard against it, and, because we are not aware of the proper successful season of actions, therefore we lose our opportunities, and miss our way; Because to every purpose there is but one way, one method, one proper opportunity, therefore the misery of man is great upon him; because it is so hard to hit that, and it is a thousand to one but he misses it. Most of the miseries men labour under had been prevented, if they could have been foreseen, and the happy time discovered to avoid them. Men are miserable, because they are not sufficiently sagacious and attentive.

4. Whatever other evils may be avoided, we are all under a fatal necessity of dying, v. 8.

(1.) When the soul is required, it must be resigned, and it is to no purpose to dispute it, either by arms or arguments, ourselves, or by any friend; There is no man that has power over his own spirit to retain it, when it is summoned to return to God who gave it. It cannot fly any where out of the jurisdiction of death, nor find any place where its writs do not run. It cannot abscond so as to escape death's eye, though it is hid from the eyes of all living. A man has no power to adjourn the day of his death, nor can he by prayers or bribes obtain a reprieve; no bail will be taken, no essoine,* protection, or imparlance,† allowed. We have not power over the spirit of a friend, to retain that; the prince, with all his authority, cannot prolong the life of the most valuable of his subjects, nor the physician, with his medicines and methods, nor the soldier, with his force, nor the orator, with his eloquence, nor the best saint, with his intercessions. The stroke of death can by no means be put by, when our days are determined, and the hour appointed us is come.

(2.) Death is an enemy that we must all enter the lists with, sooner or later; There is no discharge in that war, no dismission from it, either of the men of business, or of the faint-hearted, as there was among the Jews, Dent. 20. 5, 8. While we live, we are struggling with death, and we shall never put off the harness till we put off the body, never obtain the discharge till death has obtained the mastery; the youngest is not released as a fresh-water soldier, nor the oldest as miles emeritus—a soldier whose merits have entitled him to a discharge. Death is a battle that must be fought; There is no sending to that war, so some read it; no substituting another to muster for us, no champion admitted to fight for us; we must ourselves engage, and are concerned to provide accordingly, as for a battle.

(3.) Men's wickedness, by which they often evade or outface the justice of the prince, cannot secure them from the arrest of death, nor can the most obstinate sinner harden his heart against those terrors. Though he strengthen himself ever so much in his wickedness, (Ps. 52. 7.) death will be too strong for him; the most subtle wickedness cannot outwit death, nor the most impudent wickedness outbrave death. Nay, the wickedness which men give themselves to, will be so far from delivering them from death, that it will deliver them up to death.

9. All this have I seen, and applied my heart unto every work that is done under the sun: there is a time wherein one man ruleth over another to his own hurt. 10. And so I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone from the place of the holy, and they were forgotten in the city where they had so done: this is also vanity. 11. Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil. 12. Though a sinner do evil an hundred times, and his days be prolonged, yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, which fear before him; 13. But it shall not be well with the wicked, neither shall he prolong his days, which are as a shadow; because he feareth not before God.

Solomon, in the beginning of the chapter, had warned us against having any thing to do with seditious subjects; here, in these verses, he encourages us, in reference to the mischief of tyrannical and oppressive rulers, such as he had complained of before, ch. 3. 16.—4. 1.

1. He had observed many such rulers, v. 9. In the serious views and reviews he had taken of the children of men and their state, he had observed that many a time one man rules over another to his hurt; that is, (1.) To the hurt of the ruled, many understand it so; whereas they ought to be God's ministers unto their subjects for their good, (Rom. 13. 4.) to administer justice, and to preserve the public peace and order, they use their power for their hurt, to invade their property, encroach upon their liberty, and patronise the acts of injustice. It is sad with a people, when those that should protect their religion and rights aim at the destruction of both. (2.) To the hurt of the rulers, so we render it; to their own hurt, to the feeding of their pride and covetousness, the gratifying of their passion and revenge, and so, to the filling up of the measure of their sins, and the hastening and aggravating of their ruin. Agens agendo repatitur—What hurt men do to others, will return, in the end, to their own hurt.

2. He had observed them to prosper and flourish in the abuse of their power; (v. 10.) I saw those wicked rulers come and go from the place of the holy; go in state to, and return in pomp from, the place of judicature, (which is called the place of the Holy One, because the judgment is the Lord's, (Deut. 1. 17.) and he judges among the gods, (Ps. 82. 1.) and is with them in the judgment, (2 Chron. 19. 6.) and they continued all their days in office, were never reckoned with for their male-administration, but died in honour, and were buried magnificently; their commissions were durante vita—during life, and not quamdiu se bene gesserint—during good behaviour; and they were forgotten in the city where they had so done; their wicked practices were not remembered against them to their reproach and infamy when they were gone. Or rather, it denotes the vanity of their dignity and power, for that is his remark upon it in the close of the verse; This is also vanity. They are proud of their wealth, and power, and honour, because they sit in the place of the holy; but all this cannot secure, (1.) Their bodies from being buried in the dust; I saw them laid in the grave; and their pomp, though it attended them thither, could not descend after them, Ps. 49. 17. (2.) Nor their names from being buried in oblivion; for they were forgotten, as if they had never been.

3. He had observed that their prosperity hardened them in their wickedness, v. 11. It is true of all sinners in general, and particularly of wicked rulers, that, because sentence against their evil works is not executed speedily, they think it will never be executed, and therefore they set the law at defiance, and their hearts are full in them to do evil; they venture to do so much the more mischief, fetch a greater compass in their wicked designs, and are secure and fearless in it, and commit iniquity with a high hand. Observe, (1.) Sentence is past against evil works, and evil workers, by the righteous Judge of heaven and earth, even against the evil works of princes and great men, as well as of inferior persons. (2.) The execution of this sentence is often delayed a great while, and the sinner goes on, not only unpunished, but prosperous and successful. (3.) Impunity hardens sinners in impiety, and the patience of God is shamefully abused by many, who, instead of being led by it to repentance, are confirmed by it in their impenitency. (4.) Sinners herein deceive themselves, for though the sentence be not executed speedily, it will be executed the more severely, at last. Vengeance comes slowly, but it comes surely; and wrath is in the mean time treasured up against the day of wrath.

4. He foresaw such an end of all these things as would be sufficient to keep us from quarrelling with the Divine Providence upon account of them. He supposes a wicked ruler to do an unjust thing a hundred times, and that yet his punishment is deferred, and God's patience toward him is prolonged, much beyond what was expected, and the days of his power are lengthened out, so that he continues to oppress; yet he intimates that he should not be discouraged.

(1.) God's people are certainly a happy people, though they be oppressed; It shall be well with them that fear God, I say, with all them, and them only, which fear before him. Note, [1.] It is the character of God's people that they fear God, have an awe of him upon their hearts, and make conscience of their duty to him; and this, because they see his eye always upon them, and they know it is their concern to approve themselves to him. When they lie at the mercy of proud oppressors, they fear God more than they fear them. They do not quarrel with the providence of God, but submit to it. [2.] It is the happiness of all that fear God, that in the worst of times it shall be well with them; their happiness in God's favour cannot be prejudiced, nor their communion with God interrupted, by their troubles; they are in a good case, for they are kept in a good frame under their troubles, and in the end they shall have a blessed deliverance from, and an abundant recompence for, their troubles. And therefore surely I know, I know it by the promise of God, and the experience of all the saints, that, however it goes with others, it shall go well with them. All is well that ends well.

(2.) Wicked people are certainly a miserable people; though they prosper, and prevail, for a time, the curse is as sure to them as the blessing is to the righteous; It shall not be well with the wicked, as others think it is, who judge by outward appearance, and as they themselves expect it will be; nay, woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with them; (Isa. 3. 10, 11.) they shall be reckoned for all the ill they have done; nothing that befalls them shall be really well for them. Nihil potest ad malos pervenire quod prosit, ima nihil quod non noceat—No event can occur to the wicked which will do them good, rather, no event which will not do them harm. Seneca. Note, [1.] The wicked man's days are as a shadow, not only uncertain and declining, as all men's days are, but altogether unprofitable. A good man's days have some substance in them; he lives to a good purpose; a wicked man's days are all as a shadow, empty and worthless. [2.] These days shall not be prolonged to what he promised himself; he shall not live out half his days, Ps. 55. 23. Though they may be prolonged, (v. 12.) beyond what others expected, yet his day shall come to fall. He shall fall short of everlasting life, and then his long life on earth will be worth little. [3.] God's great quarrel with wicked people is for their not fearing before him; that is at the bottom of their wickedness, and cuts them off from all happiness.

14. There is a vanity which is done upon the earth; that there be just men, unto whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked; again, there be wicked men, to whom it happeneth according to the work of the righteous: I said that this also is vanity. 15. Then I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry: for that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun. 16. When I applied mine heart to know wisdom, and to see the business that is done upon the earth: (for also there is that neither day nor night seeth sleep with his eyes:) 17. Then I beheld all the work of God, that a man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun: because though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it; yea further; though a wise man think to know it, yet shall he not be able to find it.

Wise and good men have, of old, been perplexed with this difficulty, how the prosperity of the wicked and the troubles of the righteous can be reconciled with the holiness and goodness of the God that governs the world; concerning this, Solomon here gives us his advice.

1. He would not have us to be surprised at it, as though some strange thing happened, for he himself saw it in his days, v. 14. (1.) He saw just men, to whom it happened according to the work of the wicked, who, notwithstanding their righteousness, suffered very hard things, and continued long to do so, as if they were to be punished for some great wickedness. (2.) He saw wicked men, to whom it happened according to the work of the righteous, who prospered as remarkably as if they had been rewarded for some good deed, and that from themselves, from God, from men. We see the just troubled and perplexed in their own minds, the wicked easy, fearless, and secure; the just crossed and afflicted by the Divine Providence, the wicked prosperous, successful, and smiled upon; the just censured, reproached, and run down, by the higher powers, the wicked applauded and preferred.

2. He would have us to take occasion hence, not to charge God with iniquity, but to charge the world with vanity. No fault is to be found with God; but as to the world, This is vanity upon the earth, and again, This is also vanity, it is a certain evidence that the things of this world are not the best things, nor were ever designed to make a portion and happiness for us, for, if they had, God would not have allotted so much of this world's wealth to his worst enemies, and so much of its troubles to his best friends; there must therefore be another life after this, the joys and griefs of which must be real and substantial, and able to make men truly happy or truly miserable, for this world does neither.

3. He would have us not to fret and perplex ourselves about it, or make ourselves uneasy, but cheerfully to enjoy what God has given us in the world, to be content with it, and make the best of it, though it be much better with others, and such as we think very unworthy; (v. 15.) Then I commended joy, a holy security and serenity of mind, arising from a confidence in God, and his power, providence, and promise, because a man has no better thing under the sun (though a good man has much better things above the sun) than to eat and drink, that is, soberly and thankfully to make use of the things of this life according as his rank is, and to be cheerful, whatever happens, for that shall abide with him of his labour, that is all the fruit he has for himself of the pains that he takes in the business of the world; let him therefore take it, and much good may it do him; and let him not deny himself that, out of a peevish discontent, because the world does not go as he would have it; That shall abide with him during the days of his life which God gives him under the sun. Our present life is a life under the sun, but we look for the life of the world to come, which will commence and continue when the sun shall be turned into darkness, and shine no more. This present life must be reckoned by days; this life is given us, and the days of it allotted to us, by the counsel of God, and therefore, while it does last, we must accommodate ourselves to the will of God, and study to answer the ends of life.

4. He would not have us undertake to give a reason for that which God does, for his way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters, past finding out, and therefore we must be contentedly and piously ignorant of the meaning of God's proceedings in the government of the world, v. 16, 17. Here he shews,

(1.) That both he himself and many others had very closely studied the point, and searched far into the reasons of the prosperity of the wicked and the afflictions of the righteous; he, for his part, had applied his heart to know this wisdom, and to see the business that is done, by the Divine Providence, upon the earth, to find out if there were any certain scheme, any constant rule or method, by which the affairs of this lower world were administered, any course of government as sure and steady as the course of nature, so that by what is done now we might as certainly foretell what will be done next, as by the moon's changing now we can foretell when it will be at the full; this he would fain have found out. Others had likewise set themselves to make this inquiry with so close an application, that they could not find time for sleep, either day or night, nor find in their hearts to sleep, so full of anxiety were they about these things. Some think Solomon speaks of himself, that he was so eager in prosecuting this great inquiry, that he could not sleep for thinking of it.

(2.) That it was all labour in vain, v. 17. When we look upon all the works of God, and his providence, and compare one part with another, we cannot find that there is any such certain method by which the work that is done under the sun is directed; we cannot discover any key by which to decypher the character, nor, by consulting precedents, can we know the practice of this court, nor what the judgment will be. [1.] Though a man be ever so industrious, though he labour to seek it out; [2.] Though he be ever so ingenious, though he be a wise man in other things, and can fathom the counsels of kings themselves, and trace them by their footsteps; nay, [3.] Though he be very confident of success, though he think to know it, yet he shall not, he cannot, find it out. God's ways are above our's, nor is he tied to his own former ways, but his judgments are a great deep.

CHAP. IX.

Solomon, in this chapter, for a further proof of the vanity of this world, gives us four observations which he had made upon a survey of the state of the children of men in it. I. He observed, that, commonly, as to outward things, good and bad men fare much alike, v. 1..3. II. That death puts a final period to all our employments and enjoyments in this world, (v. 4..6.) whence he infers that it is our wisdom to enjoy the comforts of life, and mind the business of life, while it lasts, v. 7..10. III. That God's providence often crosses the fairest and most hopeful probabilities of men's endeavour, and great calamities often surprise men ere they are aware, v. 11, 12. IV. That wisdom often makes men very useful, and yet gains them little respect, for that persons of great merit are slighted, v. 13..18. And what is there then in this world, that should make us fond of it?

I FOR all this I considered in my heart even to declare all this, that the righteous, and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of God: no man knoweth either love or hatred by all that is before them. 2. All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous, and to the wicked; to the good and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good, so is the sinner; and he that sweareth, as he that feareth an oath. 3. This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun, that there is one event unto all: yea, also the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead.

It has been observed concerning those who have pretended to search for the philosophers' stone, that though they could never find what they sought for, yet in the search they have hit upon many other useful discoveries and experiments. Thus Solomon, when, in the close of the foregoing chapter, he applied his heart to know the work of God, and took a great deal of pains to search into it, though he despaired of finding it out, yet he found out that which abundantly recompensed him for the search, and gave him some satisfaction, which he here gives us; for therefore he considered all this in his heart, and weighed it deliberately, that he might declare it for the good of others. Note, What we are to declare we should first consider, think twice before we speak once; and what we have considered we should then declare; I believed, therefore have I spoken.

The great difficulty which Solomon met with in studying the book of providence, was, the little difference that is made between good men and bad, in the distribution of comforts and crosses, and the disposal of events; this has perplexed the minds of many wise and contemplative men; Solomon discourses of it in these verses, and though he does not undertake to find out this work of God, yet he says that which may prevent its being a stumbling-block to us.

1. Before he describes the temptation in its strength, he lays down a great and unquestionable truth, which he resolves to adhere to, and which, if firmly believed, will be sufficient to break the force of the temptation. This has been the way of God's people in grappling with this difficulty. Job, before he discourses of this matter, lays down the doctrine of God's omniscience, (Job, 24. 1.) Jeremiah the doctrine of his righteousness, (Jer. 12. 1.) another prophet that of his holiness, (Hab. 1. 13.) the psalmist that of his goodness and peculiar favour to his own people; (Ps. 73. 1.) and that is it which Solomon here fastens upon, and resolves to abide by, that though good and evil seem to be dispensed promiscuously, yet God has a particular care of, and concern for, his own people; The righteous and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of God, under his special protection and guidance; all their affairs are managed by him for their good; all their wise and righteous actions are in his hand, to be recompensed in the other world, though not in this. They seem as if they were given up into the hand of their enemies, but it is not so; men have no power against them, but what is given them from above; the events that affect them do not come to pass by chance, but all according to the will and council of God, which will turn that to be for them which seemed to be most against them. Let this make us easy, whatever happens, that all God's saints are in his hand, Deut. 33. 3 John, 10. 29. Ps. 31. 15.

2. He lays this down for a rule, That the love and hatred of God are not to be measured and judged of by men's outward condition. If prosperity were a certain sign of God's love, and affliction of his hatred, then it might justly be an offence to us to see the wicked and godly fare alike. But the matter is not so; No man knows either love, or hatred, by all that is before them in this world, by those things that are the objects of sense. These we may know by that which is within us; if we love God with all our heart, thereby we may know that he loves us; as we may know likewise that we are under his wrath, if we be governed by that carnal mind which is enmity to him; these will be known by that which shall be hereafter, by men's everlasting state; it is certain that men are happy or miserable, according as they are under the love or hatred of God, but not according as they are under the smiles or frowns of the world; and therefore if God loves a righteous man, (as certainly he does,) he is happy, though the world frown upon him; and if he hate a wicked man, (as certainly he does,) he is miserable, though the world smile upon him; then is the offence of this promiscuous distribution of events ceased.

3. Having laid down these principles, he acknowledges that all things come alike to all; so it has been formerly, and therefore we are not to think it strange, if it be so now, if it be so with us and our families. Some make this, and all that follows to v. 13. to be the perverse reasonings of the atheists against the doctrine of God's providence; but I rather take it to be Solomon's concession, which he might the more freely make, when he had fixed those truths which are sufficient to guard against any ill use that may be made of what he grants. Observe here, v. 2.

(1.) The great difference that there is between the characters of the righteous and the wicked, which, in several instances, are set the one over against the other, to shew that though all things come alike to all, yet that does not in the least confound the eternal distinction between moral good and evil, but that remains immutable. [1.] The righteous are clean, have clean hands and pure hearts; the wicked are unclean, under the dominion of unclean lusts, pure perhaps in their own eyes, but not cleansed from their filthiness. God will certainly put a difference between the clean and the unclean, the precious and the vile, in the other world, though he does not seem to do so in this. [2.] The righteous sacrifice, they make conscience of worshipping God according to his will, both with inward and outward worship; the wicked sacrifice not, they live in the neglect of God's worship, and grudge to part with any thing for his honour. What is the Almighty, that they should serve him? [3.] The righteous are good, good in God's sight, they do good in the world; the wicked are sinners, violating the laws of God and man, and provoking to both. [4.] The wicked man swears, has no veneration for the name of God, but profanes it by swearing rashly and falsely; but the righteous man fears an oath, swears not, but is sworn, and then with great reverence; he fears to take an oath, because it is a solemn appeal to God as a Witness and Judge; he fears, when he has taken an oath, to break it, because God is righteous, who takes vengeance.

(2.) The little difference there is between the conditions of the righteous and the wicked in this world; There is one event to both. Is David rich? So is Nabal. Is Joseph favoured by his prince? So is Haman. Is Ahab killed in a battle? So is Josiah. Are the bad figs carried to Babylon? So are the good, Jer. 24. 1. There is a vast difference between the original, the design, and the nature, of the same event to the one and to the other; the effects and issues of them are likewise vastly different; the same providence to the one is a savour of life unto life, to the other of death unto death, though, to outward appearance, it is the same.

4. He owns this to be a very great grievance to those that are wise and good; This is an evil, the greatest perplexity, among all things that are done under the sun; (v. 3.) nothing has given me more disturbance than this, that there is one event unto all. It hardens atheists, and strengthens the hands of evil doers; for therefore it is that the hearts of the sons of men are full of evil, and fully set in them to do evil, ch. 8. 11. When they see that there is one event to the righteous and the wicked, they wickedly infer thence, that it is all one to God whether they are righteous or wicked, and therefore they stick at nothing to gratify their lusts.

5. For the further clearing of this great difficulty, as he began this discourse with the doctrine of the happiness of the righteous, (whatever they may suffer, they and their works are in the hands of God, and therefore in good hands, they could not be in better,) so he concludes with the doctrine of the misery of the wicked; however they may prosper, madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead. Envy not the prosperity of evil doers, for, (1.) They are now madmen, and all the delights they seem to be blessed with are but like the pleasant dreams and fancies of a distracted man. They are mad upon their idols, (Jer. 50. 38.) are mad against God's people, Acts, 26. 11. When the prodigal repented, it is said, He came to himself, (Luke, 15. 17.) which intimates that he had been beside himself before. (2.) They will shortly be dead men. They make a mighty noise and bustle while they live, but, after a while, they go to the dead, and there is an end of all their pomp and power; they will then be reckoned with for all their madness and outrage in sin. Though, on this side death, the righteous and the wicked seem alike, on the other side death there will be a vast difference between them.

4. For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope: for a living dog is better than a dead lion. 5. For the living know that they shall die: but the dead know not any thing, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten. 6. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the sun. 7. Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works. 8. Let thy garments be always white; and let thy head lack no ointment. 9. Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity, which he hath given thee under the sun, all the days of thy vanity: for that is thy portion in this life, and in thy labour which thou takest under the sun. 10. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest.

Solomon, in a fret, had praised the dead more than the living; (ch. 4. 2.) but here, considering the advantages of life to prepare for death, and make sure the hope of a better life, he seems to be of another mind.

I. He shews the advantages which the living have above those that are dead, v. 4. . 6.

1. While there is life there is hope. Dum spiro, spero—While I breathe, I hope. It is the privilege of the living, that they are joined to the living, in relation, commerce, and conversation, and, while they are so, there is hope. If a man's condition be, upon any account, bad, there is hope it will be amended; if the heart be full of evil, and madness be in it, yet, while there is life, there is hope, that, by the grace of God, there may be a blessed change wrought; but after men go to the dead, (v. 3.) it is too late then; he that is then filthy will be filthy still, for ever filthy. If men be thrown aside as useless, yet, while they are joined to the living, there is hope that they may yet again take root, and bear fruit; he that is alive, is, or may be, good for something, but he that is dead, as to this world, is not capable of being any further serviceable; therefore a living dog is better than a dead lion, the meanest beggar alive has that comfort of this world, and does that service to it, which the greatest prince, when he is dead, is utterly incapable of.

2. While there is life, there is an opportunity of preparing for death; The living know that which the dead have no knowledge of, particularly they know that they shall die, and are, or may be, thereby influenced to prepare for that great change, which will come certainly, and may come suddenly. Note, The living cannot but know that they shall die, that they must needs die; they know they are under a sentence of death; they are already taken into custody by its messengers, and feel themselves declining. This is a needful, useful, knowledge; for what is our business, while we live, but to get ready to die? The living know they shall die, it is a thing yet to come, and therefore provision may be made for it; the dead know they are dead, and it is too late, they are on the other side the great gulf fixed.

3. When life is gone, all this world is gone with it, as to us. (1.) There is an end of all our acquaintance with this world, and the things of it; The dead know not any thing of that which, while they lived, they were intimately conversant with. It does not appear that they know any thing of what is done by those they leave behind. Abraham is ignorant of us; they are removed into darkness, Job, 10. 22. (2.) There is an end of all their enjoyments in this world; They have no more a reward for their toils about the world, but all they got must be left to others; they have a reward for their holy actions, but not for their worldly ones; the meats and the belly will be destroyed together, John, 6. 27. 1 Cor. 6. 13. It is explained, v. 6. Neither have they any more a portion for ever; none of that which they imagined would be a portion for ever, of that which is done, and got under the sun. The things of this world will not be a portion for the soul, because they will not be a portion for ever; they that choose this, and have them for their good things, have only a portion in this life, Ps. 17. 14. The world can only be an annuity for life, not a portion for ever. (3.) There is an end of their name; there are but few whose names survive them long, the grave is a land of forgetfulness, for the memory of them that are laid there, is soon forgotten; their place knows them no more, nor the lands they called by their own names. (4.) There is an end of their affections, their friendships, and enmities; Their love, and their hatred, and their envy, are now perished; the good things they loved, the evil things they hated, the prosperity of others, which they envied, are now all at an end with them. Death parts those that loved one another, and puts an end to their friendship, and those that hated one another too, and puts an end to their quarrels. Actio moritur cum persona—The person and his actions die together. There we shall be never the better for our friends, their love can do us no kindness; nor ever the worse for our enemies, their hatred and envy can do us no damage. There the wicked cease from troubling. Those things which now so affect us, and fill us, which we are so concerned about, and so jealous of, will there be at an end.

H. Hence he infers that it is our wisdom to make the best use of life that we can, while it does last, and manage wisely what remains of it.

1. Let us relish the comforts of life while we live, and cheerfully take our share of the enjoyments of it. Solomon, having been himself ensnared by the abuse of sensitive delights, warns others of the danger, not by a total prohibition of them, but by directing to the sober and moderate use of them; we may use the world, but must not abuse it; take what is to be had out of it, and expect no more.

Here we have, (1.) The particular instances of this cheerfulness prescribed; "Thou that art drooping and melancholy, go thy way, like a fool as thou art, and get into a better temper of mind."

[1.] "Let thy spirit be easy and pleasant, then let there be joy and a merry heart within;" a good heart, so the word is; which distinguishes this from carnal mirth and sensual pleasure, which are the evil of the heart, both a symptom, and a cause, of much evil there. We must enjoy ourselves, enjoy our friends, enjoy our God, and be careful to keep a good conscience, that nothing may disturb us in these enjoyments. We must serve God with gladness, in the use of what he gives us, and be liberal in communicating it to others, and not suffer ourselves to be oppressed with inordinate care and grief about the world. We must eat our bread as Israelites, not in our mourning; (Deut. 26. 14.) as Christians, with gladness and liberality of heart, Acts, 2. 46. See Deut. 28. 47.

[2.] "Make use of the comforts and enjoyments which God has given thee; eat thy bread, drink thy wine, thine, not another's; not the bread of deceit, or the wine of violence, but that which is honestly got, else thou canst not eat it with any comfort, nor expect a blessing upon it; thy bread, and thy wine, such as are agreeable to thy place and station, not extravagantly above it, nor sordidly below it; lay out what God has given thee, for the ends for which thou art intrusted with it, as being but a steward."

[3.] "Evidence thy cheerfulness; (c. 8.) Let thy garments be always white; observe a proportion in thine expences; reduce not thy food, in order to gratify thy pride, nor thy clothing, in order to gratify thy voluptuousness. Be neat, wear clean linen, and be not slovenly." Or, "Let thy garments be white, in token of joy and cheerfulness," which were expressed by white raiment; (Rev. 3. 4.) "and, as a further token of joy, let thy head lack no ointment that is fit for it;" our Saviour admitted this piece of pleasure at a feast, (Matth. 26. 7.) and David observes it among the gifts of God's bounty to him, (Ps. 23. 5.) Thou anointest my head with oil. Not that we must place our happiness in any of the delights of sense, or set our hearts upon them, but what God has given us we must make as comfortable a use of as we can afford, under the limitations of sobriety and wisdom, and not forgetting the poor.

[4.] "Make thyself agreeable to thy relations; Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest; do not engross thy delights, making much of thyself only, and not caring what becomes of those about thee, but let them share with thee, and make them easy too. Have a wife; for even in paradise it was not good for man to be alone. Keep to thy wife, to one, and do not multiply wives;" (Solomon had found the mischief of that;) "keep to her only, and have nothing to do with any other." How can a man live joyfully with one with whom he does not live honestly? "Love thy wife; and the wife whom thou lovest thou wilt be likely to live joyfully with." When we do the duty of relations, we may expect the comfort of them. See Prov. 5. 19. "Live with thy wife, and delight in her society; live joyfully with her, and be most cheerful when thou art with her. Take pleasure in thy family, thy vine and thine olive plants."

(2.) The qualifications necessary to this cheerfulness; "Rejoice, and have a merry heart, if God now accepts thy works. If thou art reconciled to God, and recommended to him, then thou hast reason to be cheerful, otherwise not." Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy, as other people, for thou hast gone a whoring from thy God, Hos. 9. 1. Our first care must be to make our peace with God, and obtain his favour, to do that which he will accept of, and then, Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy. Note, Those whose works God has accepted have reason to be cheerful, and ought to be so. "Now that thou eatest the bread of thy sacrifices with joy, and partakest of the wine of thy drink-offerings with a merry heart, now God accepts thy works: thy religious services, when performed with holy joy, are pleasing to God; he loves to have his servants sing at their work, it proclaims him a good Master.

(3.) The reasons for it; "Live joyfully, for,"

[1.] "It is all little enough to make thy passage through this world easy and comfortable; The days of thy life are the days of thy vanity; there is nothing here but trouble and disappointment; thou wilt have time enough for sorrow and grief when thou canst not help it, and therefore live joyfully while thou canst, and perplex not thyself with thoughts and cares about to-morrow; suffieient to the day is the evil thereof. Let a gracious serenity of mind be a powerful antidote against the vanity of the world."

[2.] "It is all thou canst get from this world; That is thy portion in the things of this life; in God, and another life, thou shalt have a better portion, and a better recompence for thy labours in religion; but for thy pains which thou takest about the things under the sun, this is all thou canst expect, and therefore do not deny this to thyself."

2. Let us apply ourselves to the business of life, while life lasts, and so use the enjoyments of it, as by them to be fitted for the employments; "Therefore eat with joy and a merry heart, not that thy soul may take its ease, (as Luke, 12. 19.) but that thy soul may take the more pains, and the joy of the Lord may be its strength, and oil to its wheels," v. 10. Whatsoever thy hand finds to do, do it with thy might. Observe here, (1.) There is not only something to be had, but something to be done, in this life, and the chief good we are to inquire after, is, the good we should do, Eccl. 2. 3. This is the world of service, that to come is the world of recompence; this is the world of probation and preparation for eternity; we are here upon business, and upon our behaviour. (2.) Opportunity is to direct and quicken duty; that is to be done, which our hand finds to do, which occasion calls for; and an active hand will always find something to do that will turn to a good account. What must be done, of necessity, our hand will here find a price in it for the doing of, Prov. 17. 16. (3.) What good we have an opportunity of doing, we must do, while we have the opportunity, and do it with our might, with care, vigour, and resolution, whatever difficulties and discouragements we may meet with in it. Harvest-days are busy days; and we must make hay while the sun shines. Serving God and working out our salvation must be done with all that is within us; and all little enough. (4.) There is good reason why we should work the works of him that sent us, while it is day, because the night comes, wherein no man can work, John, 9. 4. We must up and be doing now with all possible diligence, because our doing-time will be done shortly, and we know not how soon. But this we know, that if the work of life be not done when our time is done, we are undone for ever; There is no work to be done, nor device to do it, no knowledge for speculation, nor wisdom for practice, in the grave, whither thou goest. We are all going toward the grave, every day brings us a step nearer it; when we are in the grave, it will be too late to mend the errors of life, too late to repent, and make our peace with God, too late to lay up any thing in store for eternal life; it must be done now or never. The grave is a land of darkness and silence, and therefore there is no doing any thing for our souls there, it must be done now or never, John, 12. 35.

11. I returned, and saw under the sun, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill; but time and chance happeneth to them all.

12. For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare; so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them.

The preacher here, for a farther proof of the vanity of the world, and to convince us that all our works are in the hand of God, and not in our own hand, shews the uncertainty and contingency of future events, and how often they contradict the prospects we have of them. He had exhorted us (v.10.) to do what we have to do with all our might; but here he reminds us, that, when we have done all, we must leave the issue with God, and not be confident of the success.

1. We are often disappointed of the good we had great hopes of. v.11. Solomon had himself made the observation, and so has many a one since, that events, both in public and private affairs, do not always agree even with the most rational prospects and probabilities. Nullo fortuna tam dedita est, ut multa tentanti ubique respondeat—Fortune surrenders herself to no one, so as to ensure him success, however numerous his undertakings. Seneca. The issue of affairs is often unaccountably cross to every one's expectation; that the highest may not presume, nor the lowest despair, but all may live in a humble dependence upon God, from whom every man's judgment proceeds.

(1.) He gives instances of disappointment, even there where means and instruments were most encouraging, and promised fair.

[1.] One would think that the lightest of foot should, in running, win the prize; and yet the race is not always to the swift, some accident happens to retard them, or they are too secure, and therefore remiss, and let those that are slower get the start of them.

[2.] One would think that, in fighting, the most numerous and powerful army should be always victorious, and, in single combat, that the bold and mighty champion should win the laurel; but the battle is not always to the strong; a host of Philistines was once put to flight by Jonathan and his man; one of you shall chase a thousand; the goodness of the cause has often carried the day against the most formidable power.

[3.] One would think that men of sense should always be men of substance, and that those who know how to live in the world should not only have a plentiful maintenance, but get great estates; and yet it does not always prove so; even bread is not always to the wise, much less riches always to men of understanding. Many ingenious men, and men of business, who were likely to thrive in the world, have strangely gone backward, and come to nothing.

[4.] One would think that those who understand men, and have the art of management, should always get preferment, and obtain the smiles of great men; but many ingenious men have been disappointed, and have spent their days in obscurity, nay, have fallen into disgrace, and perhaps have ruined themselves, by those very methods by which they hoped to have raised themselves; for favour is not always to men of skill, but fools are favoured, and wise men frowned upon.

(2.) He resolves all these disappointments into an over-ruling power and providence, the disposals of which to us seem casual, and we call them chance, but really they are according to the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, here called time, in the language of this book, ch. 3. 1. Ps. 31. 15. Time and chance happen to them all. A sovereign Providence breaks men's measures, and blasts their hopes, and teaches them that the way of man is not in himself, but subject to the divine will. We must use means, but not trust to them; if we succeed, we must give God the praise; (Ps. 44. 3.) if we be crossed, we must acquiesce in his will, and take our lot.

2. We are often surprised with the evils we were in little fear of; (v. 12.) Man knows not his time, the time of his calamity, his fall, his death, which, in scripture, is called our day, and our hour.

(1.) We know not what troubles are before us, which will take us off our business, and take us out of the world, what time and chance will happen to us, nor what one day, or a night, may bring forth. It is not for us to know the times, no, not our own time, when, or how, we shall die. God has, in wisdom, kept us in the dark, that we may be always ready. (2.) Perhaps we may meet with trouble in that very thing wherein we promise ourselves the greatest satisfaction and advantage; as the fishes and the birds are drawn into the snare and net by the bait laid to allure them, which they greedily catch at, so are the sons of men often snared in an evil time, when it falls suddenly upon them, before they are aware. And these things too come alike to all. Men often find their bane where they sought their bliss, and catch their death where they thought to have found a prize. Let us therefore never be secure, but always ready for changes, that, though they may be sudden, they may be no surprise or terror to us.

13. This wisdom have I seen also under the sun, and it seemed great unto me: 14. There was a little city, and few men within it; and there came a great king against it, and besieged it, and built great bulwarks against it: 15. Now there was found in it a poor wise man, and he by his wisdom delivered the city; yet no man remembered that same poor man. 16. Then said I, Wisdom is better than strength: nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard. 17. The words of wise men are heard in quiet more than the cry of him that ruleth among fools. 18. Wisdom is better than weapons of war: but one sinner destroyeth much good.

Solomon still recommends wisdom to us as necessary to the preserving of our peace and the perfecting of our business, notwithstanding the vanities and crosses which human affairs are subject to. He had said, (v. 11.) Bread is not always to the wise; yet he would not therefore be thought either to disparage, or to discourage, wisdom, no, he still retains his principle, that wisdom excels folly as much as light excels darkness, (ch. 2. 13.) and we ought to love and embrace it, and be governed by it, for the sake of its own intrinsic worth, and the capacity it gives us of being serviceable to others, though we ourselves should not get wealth and preferment by it. This wisdom, this which he here describes, wisdom, which enables a man to serve his country, out of pure affection to its interests, when he himself gains no advantage by it, no not so much as thanks for his pains, or the reputation of it, this is the wisdom which, Solomon says, seemed great unto him, v. 13. A public spirit, in a private sphere, is wisdom, which those who understand things that differ, cannot but look upon as very magnificent.

1. Solomon here gives an instance, which, probably, was a case in fact, in some neighbouring country, of a poor man who with his wisdom did great service in a time of public distress and danger; (v. 14.) There was a little city, (no great prize, whoever was master of it,) there were but few men within it to defend it, and men, if men of fortitude, are the best fortifications of a city; here were few men, and, because few, feeble, fearful, and ready to give up their city as not tenable. Against this little city a great king came with a numerous army, and besieged it, either in pride, or covetousness to possess it, or in revenge for some affront given him, to chastise and destroy it; thinking it stronger than it was, he built great bulwarks against it, from which to batter it, and doubted not in a little time to make himself master of it. What a great deal of unjust vexation do ambitious princes give to their harmless neighbours! This great king needed not fear this little city; why then should he frighten it? It would be little profit to him: why then should he put himself to such a great expence to gain it? But, as unreasonably and insatiably greedy as little people sometimes are to lay house to house, and field to field, great kings often are, to lay city to city, and province to province, that they may be placed alone in the earth, Isa. 5. 8. Did victory and success attend the strong? No, there was found in this little city, among the few men that were in it, one poor wise man; a wise man, and yet poor, and not preferred to any place of profit or power in the city; places of trust were not given to men according *to their merit, and meetness for them, else such a wise man as this had not been a poor man. Now,

1. Being wise, he served the city, though he was poor; in their distress they found him out, (Judg. 11. 7.) and begged his advice and assistance; and he by his wisdom delivered the city, either by prudent instructions given to the besieged, directing them to some unthought of stratagem for their own security, or by a prudent treaty with the besiegers, as the woman at Abel, 2 Sam. 20. 16. He did not upbraid them with the contempt they had put upon him, in leaving him out of their council, nor tell them he was poor, and had nothing to lose, and therefore cared not what became of the city; but did his best for it, and was blessed with success. Note, Private interests and personal resentments must always be sacrificed to the public good, and forgotten when the common welfare is concerned.

2. Being poor, he was slighted by the city, though he was wise, and had been an instrument to save them all from ruin; No man remembered that same poor man, his good services were not taken notice of, no recompence was made him, no marks of honour put upon him, but he lived in as much poverty and obscurity as he had done before; riches were not to this man of understanding, nor favour to this man of skill. Many who have well-merited of their prince and country have been ill-paid; such an ungrateful world do we live in. It is well that useful men have a God to trust to, who will be their bountiful Rewarder; for, among men, great services are often envied, and rewarded with evil for good.

II. From this instance he draws some useful inferences; looks upon it, and receives instruction.

1. Hence he observes the great usefulness and excellency of wisdom, and what a blessing it makes men to their country; Wisdom is better than strength, v. 16. A prudent mind, which is the honour of a man, is to be preferred before a robust body, in which many of the brute creatures excel man. A man may by his wisdom effect that which he could never compass by his strength; and may overcome those, by out-witting them, who are able to overpower him. Nay, wisdom is better than weapons of war, offensive or defensive, v. 18. Wisdom, that is, religion and piety, (for the wise man is here opposed to a sinner,) this is better than all military endowments or accoutrements, for it will engage God for us, and then we are safe in the greatest perils, and successful in the greatest enterprises. If God be for us, who can be against us, or stand before us?

2. Hence he observes the commanding force and power of wisdom, though it labour under external disadvantages; (v. 17.) The words of wise men are heard in quiet; what they speak, being rational and to the purpose, being spoken calmly and with deliberation, (though, not being rich and in authority, they dare not speak loud, nor with any great assurance,) will be hearkened to and regarded, will gain respect, nay, will gain the point, and sway with men, more than the imperious clamour of him that rules among fools, who, like fools, chose him to be their ruler, for his noise and blustering, and, like fools, think he must by those methods carry the day with every body else. A few close arguments are worth a great many big words; and those will strike sail to fair reasoning, who will answer them that hector and insult according to their folly. How forcible are right words! What is spoken wisely should be spoken calmly, and then it will be heard in quiet, and calmly considered. But passion will lessen the force even of reason, instead of adding any force to it.

3. Hence he observes that wise and good men, notwithstanding this, must often content themselves with the satisfaction of having done good, or, at least, endeavoured it, and offered at it, when they cannot do the good they would do, nor have the praise they should have. Wisdom capacitates a man to serve his neighbours, and he offers his service; but, alas, if he be poor, his wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard, v. 16. Many a man is buried alive in poverty and obscurity, who, if he had but fit encouragement given him, might be a great blessing to the world; many a pearl is lost in its shell. But there is a day coming, when wisdom and goodness shall be in honour, and the righteous shall shine forth.

4. From what he had observed of the great good which one wise and virtuous man may do, he infers what a great deal of mischief one wicked man may do, and what a great deal of good he may be the hinderance of; One sinner destroyeth much good. (1.) As to himself, a sinful condition is a wasteful condition. How many of the good gifts both of nature and Providence does one sinner destroy, and make waste of—good sense, good parts, good learning, a good disposition, a good estate, good meat, good drink, and abundance of God's good creatures, all made use of in the service of sin, and so destroyed and lost, and the end of giving them frustrated and perverted! He who destroys his own soul destroys much good. (2.) As to others, what a great deal of mischief may one wicked man do in a town or country! One sinner, who makes it his business to debauch others, may defeat and frustrate the intentions of a great many good laws, and a great deal of good preaching, and draw many into his pernicious ways; one sinner may be the ruin of a town, as one Achan troubled the whole camp of Israel. The wise man, who delivered the city, had had his due respect and recompence for it, but that some one sinner hindered it, and invidiously diminished the service. And many a good project, well-laid for the public welfare, has been destroyed by some one subtle adversary to it. The wisdom of some would have healed the nation, but through the wickedness of a few, it would not be healed. See who are a kingdom's friends and enemies, if one saint does much good, and one sinner destroys much good.

CHAP. X.

This chapter seems to be like Solomon's proverbs, a collection of wise sayings and observations, rather than a part of his sermon; but the preacher studied to be sententious, and set in order many proverbs, to be brought in in his preaching.

Yet the general scope of all the observations in this chapter, is, to recommend wisdom to us, and its precepts and rules, as of great use for the right ordering of our conversation, and to caution us against folly. I. He recommends wisdom to private persons, who are in an inferior station. 1. It is our wisdom to preserve our reputation, in managing our affairs dexterously, v. 1. 3. 2. To be submissive to our superiors, if at any time we have offended them, v. 4. 3. To live quiet and peaceable lives, and not to meddle with those that are factious and seditious, and are endeavouring to disturb the government, and the public repose; the folly and danger of which disloyal and turbulent practices he shews, v. 8. 11. 4. To govern our tongues well, v. 12. 15. 5. To be diligent in our business and provide well for our families, v. 18, 19. 6. Not to speak ill of our rulers, no not in secret, v. 20. II. He recommends wisdom to rulers; let them not think that, because their subjects must be quiet under them, therefore they may do what they please; no, but, 1. Let them be careful whom they prefer to places of trust and power, v. 5. 7. 2. Let them manage themselves discreetly, be generous, and not childish; temperate, and not luxurious, v. 16, 17. Happy the nation, when princes and people make conscience of their duty, according to these rules.

1. DEAD flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour: so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour. 2. A wise man's heart is at his right hand; but a fool's heart at his left. 3. Yea also, when he that is a fool walketh by the way, his wisdom faileth him, and he saith to every one that he is a fool.

In these verses, Solomon shews,

1. What great need wise men have to take heed of being guilty of any instance of folly; for a little folly is a great blemish to him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour, and is as hurtful to his good name as dead flies are to a sweet perfume, not only spoiling the sweetness of it, but making it to send forth a stinking savour. Note, (1.) True wisdom is true honour, and will gain a man a reputation, which is like a box of precious ointment, pleasing and very valuable. (2.) The reputation that is got hardly, and by a great deal of wisdom, may be easily lost, and by a little folly; because envy fastens upon eminency, and makes the worst of the mistakes and miscarriages of those who are cried up for wisdom, and improves them to their disadvantage; so that the folly which in another would not be taken notice of, in them is severely censured. Those who make a great profession of religion have need to walk very circumspectly, to abstain from all appearances of evil and approaches towards it, because many eyes are upon them, that watch for their halting; their character is soon sullied, and they have a great deal of reputation to lose.

2. What a deal of advantage a wise man has above a fool in the management of business; (v. 2.) A wise man's heart is at his right hand, so that he goes about his business with dexterity, turns his hand readily to it, and goes through it with dispatch; his counsel and courage are ready to him, whenever he has occasion for them; but a fool's heart is at his left hand, it is always to seek when he has any thing to do that is of importance, and therefore he goes awkwardly about it, like a man that is left-handed; he is soon at a loss, and at his wit's end.

3. How apt fools are, at every turn, to proclaim their own folly, and expose themselves; he that is either witless or graceless, either silly or wicked, if he be ever so little from under the check, and left to himself, if he but talk by the way, soon shows what he is; his wisdom fails him, and, by some impropriety or other, he says to every one he meets, that he is a fool, (v. 3.) he discovers it as plainly as if he had told them so. He cannot conceal it, and he is not ashamed of it. Sin is the reproach of sinners, wherever they go.

4. If the spirit of the ruler rise up against thee, leave not thy place; for yielding pacieth great offences. 5. There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, as an error which proceedeth from the ruler: 6. Folly is set in great dignity, and the rich sit in low place. 7. I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth. 8. He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it; and whoso breaketh an hedge, a serpent shall bite him. 9. Whoso removeth stones shall be hurt therewith; and he that cleaveth wood shall be endangered thereby. 10. If the iron be blunt, and he do not whet the edge, then must he put to more strength: but wisdom is profitable to direct. 11. Surely the serpent will bite without enchantment, and a babler is no better.

The scope of these verses is to keep subjects loyal and dutiful to the government; in Solomon's reign, the people were very rich, and lived in prosperity, which perhaps made them proud and petulant, and when the taxes were high, though they had enough to pay them with, it is probable that many carried it insolently toward the government, and threatened to rebel. To such Solomon here gives some necessary cautions.

I. Let not subjects carry on a quarrel with their prince upon any private personal disgust; (v. 4.) "If the spirit of the ruler rise up against thee, if, upon some misinformation given him, or some mismanagement of thine, he is displeased at thee, and threaten thee, yet leave not thy place, forget not the duty of a subject, revolt not from thy allegiance, do not, in a passion, quit thy post in his service, and throw up thy commission, as despairing ever to regain his favour; no, wait a while, and thou wilt find he is not implacable, but that yielding pacifies great offences." Solomon speaks for himself, and for every wise and good man that is a master, or a magistrate, that he could easily forgive those, upon their submission, whom yet, upon their provocation, he had been very angry with. It is fairer and better to yield to an angry prince than to contend with him.

II. Let not subjects commence a quarrel with their prince, though the public administration be not in every thing as they would have it. He grants there is an evil often seen under the sun, and it is a king's evil, an evil which the king only can cure, for it is an error which proceeds from the ruler; (v. 5.) it is a mistake which rulers, consulting their personal affections more than the public interests, are too often guilty of, that men are not preferred according to their merit, but folly is set in great dignity, men of shattered brains, and broken fortunes, are put in places of power and trust, while the rich men of good sense and good estates, whose interest would oblige them to be true to the public, and whose abundance would be likely to set them above temptations to bribery and extortion, yet sit in low places, and can get no preferment; (v. 6.) either the ruler knows not how to value them, or the terms of preferment are such as they cannot in conscience comply with. It is ill with a people, when vicious men are advanced, and men of worth are kept under hatches. This is illustrated; (v. 7.) I have seen servants upon horses; men not so much of mean extraction and education, (if that were all, it were the more excusable, nay, there is many a wise servant, who with good reason has rule over a son that causes shame;) but of sordid, servile, mercenary, dispositions, I have seen these riding in pomp and state as princes, while princes, men of noble birth and qualities, fit to rule a kingdom, have been forced to walk as servants upon the earth, poor, and despised. Thus God, in his providence, punishes a wicked people; but as far as it is the ruler's act and deed, it is certainly his error, and a great evil, a grievance to the subject, and very provoking; but it is an error under the sun, which will certainly be rectified above the sun, and when it shall shine no more, for in heaven it is only wisdom and holiness that are set in great dignity. But if the prince be guilty of this error, yet let not the subjects leave their places, nor rise up against the government, nor form any project for the alteration of it; nor let the prince carry on the humour too far, nor set such servants, such beggars, on horseback, as will ride furiously over the ancient landmarks of the constitution, and threaten the subversion of it.

1. Let neither prince nor people violently attempt any changes, nor make a forcible entry upon a national settlement, for they will both find it of dangerous consequence, which he shews here by four similitudes, the scope of which is to give us a caution not to meddle to our own hurt. Let not princes invade the rights and liberties of their subjects; let not subjects mutiny and rebel against their princes: for, (1.) He that digs a pit for another, it is ten to one but he falls into it himself, and his violent dealing returns upon his own head. If princes become tyrants, or subjects become rebels, all histories will tell both what is likely to be their fate, and that it is at their utmost peril, and it were better for both to be content within their own bounds. (2.) Whoso breaks a hedge, an old hedge, that has long been a land-mark, let him expect that a serpent or adder, such as harbour in rotten hedges, will bite him; some viper or other will fasten upon his hand, Acts, 28. 3. God, by his ordinance, as by a hedge, has enclosed the prerogatives and powers of princes, their persons are under his special protection; those therefore that form any treasonable designs against their peace, their crown and dignity, are but twisting halters for themselves. (3.) Whoso removes stones, to pull down a wall or building, does but pluck them upon himself, he shall be hurt therewith, and will wish that he had let them alone. Those that go about to alter a well-modelled, well-settled, government, under colour of redressing some grievances, and correcting some faults in it, will quickly perceive, not only that it is easier to find fault than to mend, to demolish that which is good than to build up that which is better, but that they thrust their own fingers into the fire, and overwhelm themselves in the ruin they occasion. (4.) He that cleaves the wood, especially if, as it follows, he has sorry tools, (v. 10.) he shall be endangered thereby, the chips, or his own axe-head, will fly in his face. If we meet with knotty pieces of timber, men of perverse and ungovernable spirits, and we think to master them by force and violence, and hew them to pieces, they may not only prove too hard for us, but the attempt may turn to our damage.

2. Rather let both prince and people act towards each other with prudence, mildness, and good temper; Wisdom is profitable to direct the ruler how to manage a people that are inclined to be turbulent, so as neither, on the one hand, by a supine negligence, to embolden and encourage them, nor, on the other hand, by rigour and severity, to exasperate and provoke them to any seditious practices. It is likewise profitable to direct the subjects how to act towards a prince that is inclined to bear hard upon them, so as not to alienate his affections from them, but to win upon him, by humble remonstrances, (not insolent demands, such as the people made upon Rehoboam,) by patient submissions, and peaceable expedients. The same rule is to be observed in all relations, for the preserving of the comfort of them; let wisdom direct to gentle methods, and forbear violent ones.

(1.) Wisdom will teach us to whet the tool we are to make use of, rather than, by leaving it blunt, oblige ourselves to put to so much the more strength, v. 10. We might save ourselves a great deal of labour, and prevent a great deal of danger, if we did whet before we cut, consider and premeditate what is fit to be said and done in every difficult case, that we may accommodate ourselves to it, and may do our work smoothly and easily both to others and to ourselves. Wisdom will direct how to sharpen and put an edge upon both ourselves and those we employ, not to work deceitfully, (Ps. 53. 2.) but to work cleanly and cleverly. The mower loses no time, when he is whetting his scythe.

(2.) Wisdom will teach us to enchant the serpent we are to contend with, rather than think to out-hiss it; (v. 11.) The serpent will bite, if he be not by singing and music charmed and enchanted, against which therefore he stops his ears; (Ps. 58. 4, 5.) and a babbler is no better to all those who enter the lists with him, who therefore must not think by dint of words to out-talk him, but by prudent management to enchant him. He that is lord of the tongue, so the phrase is, a ruler that has liberty of speech, and may say what he will, it is as dangerous dealing with him, as with a serpent uncharmed; but, if you use the enchantment of a mild and humble submission, you may be safe, and out of danger; herein wisdom, the meekness of wisdom, is profitable to direct. By long forbearing is a prince persuaded, Prov. 25. 15. Jacob enchanted Esau with a present, and Abigail David. To those that may say any thing, it is wisdom to say nothing that is provoking.

12. The words of a wise man's mouth are gracious; but the lips of a fool will swallow up himself. 13. The beginning of the words of his mouth is foolishness: and the end of his talk is mischievous madness. 14. A fool also is full of words: a man cannot tell what shall be; and what shall be after him, who can tell him? 15. The labour of the foolish wearieth every one of them, because he knoweth not how to go to the city.

Solomon having shewed the benefit of wisdom, and of what great advantage it is to us in the management of our affairs, here shews the mischief of folly, and how it exposes men; which perhaps comes in as a reflection upon those rulers who set folly in great dignity.

1. Fools talk a great deal to no purpose, and they shew their folly as much by the multitude, impertinence, and mischievousness, of their words, as by any thing; whereas the words of a wise man's mouth are gracious, are grace, manifest grace in his heart, and minister grace to the hearers, are good, and such as become him, and do good to all about him, the lips of a fool not only expose him to reproach, and make him ridiculous, but will swallow up himself, and bring him to ruin, by provoking the government to take cognizance of his seditious talk, and call him to an account for it. Adonijah foolishly spoke against his own life, 1 Kings, 2. 23. Many a man has been sunk by having his own tongue fall upon him, Ps. 64. 8. See what a fool's talk is.

(1.) It takes rise from his own weakness and wickedness; The beginning of the words of his mouth is foolishness; the foolishness bound up in his heart, that is the corrupt spring out of which all these polluted streams flow, the evil treasure out of which evil things are brought. As soon as he begins to speak, you may perceive his folly; at the very first he talks idly, and passionately, and like himself.

(2.) It riseth up to fury, and tends to the hurt and injury of others; The end of his talk, the end it comes to, is madness; he will presently talk himself into an indecent heat, and break out into the wild extravagancies of a distracted man; the end he aims at, is, mischief; as, at first, he appeared to have little government of himself, so, at last, it appears he has a great deal of malice to his neighbours; that root of bitterness bears gall and wormwood. Note, It is not strange if those that begin foolishly, and madly; for an ungoverned tongue, the more liberty is allowed, grows the more violent.

(3.) It is all the same over and over; (v. 14.) A fool also is full of words, a passionate fool especially, that runs on endlessly, and never knows when to take up; he will have the last word, though it be but the same with that which was the first; what is wanting in the weight and strength of his words, he endeavours in vain to make up in the number of them; and they must be repeated, because otherwise there is nothing in them to make them regarded. Note, Many, who are empty of sense, are full of words, and the least solid are the most noisy. The following words may be taken either, [1.] As checking him for his vain-glorious boasting in the multitude of his words, what he will do, and what he will have, not considering that which every body knows, that a man cannot tell what shall be in his own time, while he lives, (Prov. 27. 1.) much less can one tell what shall be after him, when he is dead and gone. Would we duly consider our own ignorance of, and uncertainty about, future events, it would cut off a great many of the idle words we foolishly multiply. Or, [2.] As mocking him for his tautologies; he is full of words, for, if he do but speak the most trite and common thing, a man cannot tell what shall be, because he loves to hear himself talk, he will say it again, what shall be after him, who can tell him? like Battus in Ovid:

—Sub illis

Montibus (inquit) erant, et erant sub montibus illis—

Under those mountains were they,

They were under those mountains, I say.

whence vain repetitions are called Battologies, Matth. 6. 7.

2. Fools toil a great deal to no purpose; (v. 15.) The labour of the foolish, to accomplish their designs, wearies every one of them.

(1.) They weary themselves in that labour which is very foolish and absurd. All their labour is for the world and the body, and the meat that perishes, and in this labour they spend their strength and exhaust their spirits, and weary themselves for very vanity, Hab. 2. 13. Isa. 55. 2. They choose that service which is perfect drudgery, rather than that which is perfect liberty. (2.) That labour which is necessary, and would be profitable, and might be gone through with ease, wearies them, because they go about it awkwardly, and foolishly, and so make their business a toil to them, which, if they applied themselves to it prudently, would be a pleasure to them. Many complain of the labours of religion as grievous, which they would have no reason to complain of, if the exercises of Christian piety were always under the direction of Christian prudence. The foolish tire themselves in endless pursuits, and never bring any thing to pass, because they know not how to go to the city, because they have not capacity to apprehend the plainest thing, such as the entrance into a great city is, where one would think it were impossible for a man to miss his road. Men's imprudent management of their business robs them both of the comfort and of the benefit of it. But it is the excellency of the way to the heavenly city, that it is a high-way, in which the way-faring men, though fools, shall not err; (Isa. 35. 8.) yet sinful folly makes men miss that way.

16. Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child, and thy princes eat in the morning! 17. Blessed art thou, O land, when thy king is the son of nobles, and thy princes eat in due season, for strength, and not for drunkenness! 18. By much slothfulness the building decayeth; and through idleness of the hands the house droppeth through. 19. A feast is made for laughter, and wine maketh merry:

but money answereth all things. 20. Curse not the king, no, not in thy thought; and curse not the rich in thy bed-chamber: for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter.

Solomon here observes,

1. How much the happiness of a land depends upon the character of its rulers; it is well or ill, with the people, according as the princes are good, or bad.

(1.) The people cannot be happy, when their princes are childish and voluptuous; (v. 16.) Woe unto thee, O land, even the land of Canaan itself, though otherwise the glory of all lands, when thy king is a child, not so much in age (Solomon himself was young when his kingdom was happy in him) as in understanding; when the prince is weak and foolish as a child, fickle and fond of changes, fretful and humoursome, easily imposed upon, and hardly brought to business, it is ill with the people. The body staggers, if the head be giddy. Perhaps Solomon wrote this, with a foresight of his son Rehoboam's ill conduct; (2 Chron. 13. 7.) he was a child all the days of his life, and his family and kingdom fared the worse for it. Nor is it much better with a people, when their princes eat in the morning, make a god of their belly, and make themselves slaves to their appetites. If the king himself were a child, yet if the princes and privy-counsellors are wise and faithful, and apply themselves to business, the land may do the better; but if they addict themselves to their pleasures, and prefer the gratifications of the flesh before the dispatch of the public business, which they disfit themselves for by eating and drinking in a morning, when judges are epicures, and do not eat to live, but live to eat, what good can a nation expect?

(2.) The people cannot but be happy, when their rulers are generous and active, sober and temperate, and men of business, v. 17. The land is then blessed, [1.] When the sovereign is governed by principles of honour, when the king is the son of nobles, acted and animated by a noble spirit, which scorns to do any thing base, and unbecoming so high a character, which is solicitous for the public welfare, and prefers that before any private interests. Wisdom, virtue, and the fear of God, beneficence, and a readiness to do good to all mankind, these ennoble the royal blood. [2.] When the subordinate magistrates are more in care to discharge their trusts than to gratify their appetites, when they eat in due season, that is, when they have dispatched their business, and got them an appetite. God gives the creatures their meat in due season, (Ps. 145. 15.) let us not take our's unseasonably, lest we lose the comfort of seeing God give it us. Magistrates should eat for strength, that their bodies may be fitted to serve their souls in the service of God and their country, and not for drunkenness, to make themselves unfit to do any thing either for God or man, and particularly to sit in judgment, for they will err through wine, (Isa. 28. 7.) will drink and forget the law, (Prov. 31. 5.) It is well with a people, when their princes are examples of temperance, when those that have most to spend upon themselves know how to deny themselves.

2. Of what ill consequence slothfulness is both to private and public affairs; (v. 18.) By much slothfulness and idleness of the hands, the neglect of business, and the love of ease and pleasure, the building decays, drops through first, and by degrees drops down; if it be not kept well covered, and care be not taken to repair the breaches, as any happen, it will rain in, and the timber will rot, and the house will become unfit to dwell in: it is so with the family and the affairs of it; if men cannot find in their hearts to take pains in their cullings, to tend their shops, and look after their own business, they will soon run in debt, and go behind-hand, and, instead of making what they have, more, for their children, will make it less; it is so with the public; if the king be a child, and will take no care, if the princes eat in the morning, and will take no pains, the affairs of the nation suffer loss, and its interests are prejudiced, its honours sullied, its power weakened, its borders encroached upon, the course of justice obstructed, the treasure exhausted, and all its foundations out of course; and all this, through the slothfulness and self-seeking of those that should be the repairers of its breaches, and the restorers of paths to dwell in, Isa. 58. 12.

3. How industrious, generally, all are, both princes and people, to get money, because that serves for all purposes, v. 19. He seems to prefer money before mirth; A feast is made for laughter, not merely for eating, but chiefly for pleasant conversation, and the society of friends; not the laughter of the fool, which is madness, but that of wise men, by which they fit themselves for business, and severe studies. Spiritual feasts are made for spiritual laughter, holy joy in God. Wine makes merry, makes glad the life, but money is the measure of all things, and answers all things. Pecunia obediunt omnia—Money commands all things. Though wine make merry, it will not be a house for us, nor a bed, nor clothing, nor provisions and portions for children; but money, if men have enough of it, will be all these. The feast cannot be made without money, and though men have wine, they are not so much disposed to be merry, unless they have money for the necessary supports of life. Money, of itself, answers nothing; it will neither feed nor clothe, but, as it is the instrument of commerce, it answers all the occasions of this present life; what is to be had, may be had for money, but it answers nothing to the soul; it will not procure the pardon of sin, the favour of God, the peace of conscience; the soul, as it is not redeemed, so it is not maintained, with corruptible things, as silver and gold. Some refer this to rulers; it is ill with the people, when they give up themselves to luxury and riot, feasting and making merry, not only because their business is neglected, but because money must be had, to answer all these things, and, in order to that, the people squeezed by heavy taxes.

4. How cautious subjects have need to be, that they harbour not any disloyal purposes in their minds, nor keep up any factious cabals or consultations against the government, because it is ten to one that they are discovered and brought to light, v. 20. "Though rulers should be guilty of some errors, yet be not, upon all occasions, arraigning their administration and running them down, but make the best of them. "Here, (1.) The command teaches us our duty; Curse not the king, no, not in thy thought, do not wish ill to the government in thy mind." All sin begins there, and therefore the first risings of it must be curbed and suppressed, and particularly that of treason and sedition. Curse not the rich, the princes and governors, in thy bed-chamber, in a conclave, or club, of persons disaffected to the government; associate not with such; come not into their secret; join not with them in speaking ill of the government, or plotting against it." (2.) The reason consults our safety; "Though the design be carried on ever so closely, a bird of the air shall carry the voice to the king, who has more spies about than thou art aware of, and that which has wings shall tell the matter, to thy confusion and ruin." God sees what men do, and hears what they say, in secret; and, when he pleases, he can bring to light by strange and unsuspected ways. Wouldest thou then not be hurt by the powers that be, nor be afraid of them? Do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same; but if thou do that which is evil, be afraid, Rom. 13, 3, 4.

CHAP. XI.

In this chapter, we have, I. A pressing exhortation to works of charity and bounty to the poor, as the best cure of the vanity which our worldly riches are subject to, and the only way of making them turn to a substantial good account, v. 1. .6. II. A serious admonition to prepare for death and judgment, and to begin betimes, even in the days of our youth, to do so, v. 7. .10.

1. CAST thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days. 2. Give a portion to seven, and also to eight; for thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth. 3. If the clouds be full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth: and if the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be. 4. He that observeth the wind shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap. 5. As thou knowest not what is the way of the spirit, nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child: even so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all. 6. In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand: for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good.

Solomon had often, in this book, pressed it upon rich people to take the comfort of their riches themselves; here he presses it upon them to do good to others with them, and to abound in liberality to the poor, which will, another day, abound to their account. Observe,

I. How the duty itself is recommended to us, v. 1.

1. Cast thy bread upon the waters, thy bread-corn upon the low places, so some understand it, alluding to the husbandman, who goes forth, bearing precious seed, sowing bread-corn from his family for his seedness, knowing that, without that, he can have no harvest another year; thus the charitable man takes from his bread-corn for seed-corn, abridges himself to supply the poor, that he may sow beside all waters, (Isa. 32. 20.) because, as he sows, he must reap, Gal. 6. 7. We read of the harvest of the river, Isa. 23. 3. Waters, in scripture, are put for multitudes, (Rev. 16. 5.) and there are multitudes of poor, we do not want objects of charity; waters are put also for mourners, the poor are men of sorrows. Thou must give bread, the necessary supports of life, not only give good words, but good things, Isa. 58. 7. It must be thy bread, that which is honestly got; it is no charity, but injury, to give that which is none of our own to give; first, do justly, and then love mercy. “Thy bread, which thou didst design for thyself, let the poor have a share with thee, as they had with Job, ch. 31. 17. Give freely to the poor, though it may seem thrown away and lost, as that which is cast upon the waters. Send it a voyage, send it at a venture, as merchants that trade by sea; trust it upon the waters, it shall not sink.”

2. “Give a portion to seven, and also to eight; be free and liberal in works of charity.” (1.) “Give much, if thou hast much to give, not a pittance, but a portion, not a bit or two, but a mess, a meal; give a large dole, not a paltry one; give good measure, (Luke, 6. 38.) be generous in giving, as they were, when, on festival days, they sent portions to them for whom nothing was prepared, (Neh. 8. 10.) worthy portions.” (2.) “Give to many, to seven, and also to eight; if thou meet with seven objects of charity, give to them all, and then, if thou meet with an eighth, give to that, and if with eight more, give to them all too. Excuse not thyself with the good thou hast done, from the good thou hast further to do, but hold on, and mend. In hard times, when the number of the poor increases, let thy charity be proportionably enlarged.” God is rich in mercy to all, to us, though unworthy, he gives liberally, and upbraids not with former gifts, and we must be merciful, as our heavenly Father is.

II. The reasons with which it is pressed upon us. Consider,

1. Our reward for well-doing is very certain. “Though thou cast it upon the waters, and it seem lost, thou thinkest thou hast given thy good word with it, and art likely never to hear of it again, yet thou shalt find it after many days, as the husbandman finds his seed again in a plentiful harvest, and the merchant his venture in a rich return. It is not lost, but well laid out, and well laid up; it brings in full interest, in the present gifts of God’s providence, and graces and comforts of his Spirit; and the principal is sure, laid up in heaven, for it is lent to the Lord.” Seneca, a heathen, could say, Nihil magis possidere me credam quam bene donata—I possess nothing so completely as that which I have given away. Hoc habeo quodcumque dedi; hæc sunt divitiæ certæ in quacumque sortis humanæ ieritate—Whatever I have imparted I still possess, these riches remain with me through all the vicissitudes of life. “Thou shalt find it, perhaps not quickly, but after many days; the return may be slow, but it is sure, and will be so much the more plentiful.” Wheat, the most valuable grain, lies longest in the ground. Long voyages make the best returns.

2. Our opportunity for well-doing is very uncertain; “Thou knowest not what evil may be upon the earth, which may deprive thee of thine estate, and put thee out of a capacity to do good, and therefore, while thou hast wherewithal, be liberal with it; improve the present season, as the husbandman in sowing his ground, before the frost comes.” We have reason to expect evil upon the earth, for we are born to trouble; what the evil may be we know not, but, that we may be ready for it, whatever it is, it is our wisdom, in the day of prosperity, to be in good, to be doing good. Many make use of this as an argument against giving to the poor, because they know not what hard times may come, when they may want themselves; whereas we should therefore the rather be charitable, that, when evil days come, we may have the comfort of having done good while we were able; we would then hope to find mercy both with God and man, and therefore should now shew mercy. If by charity we trust God with what we have, we put it into good hands, against bad times.

III. How he obviates the objections which might be made against this duty, and the excuses of the uncharitable.

1. Some will say, that what they have is their own, and they have it for their own use, and will ask, Why should we cast it thus upon the waters? Why should I take my bread, and my flesh, and give it to I know not whom? So Nabal pleaded, 1 Sam. 25. 11. Look up, man, and consider how soon thou wouldest be starved in a barren ground, if the clouds over thy head should plead thus, that they have their waters for themselves; but thou seest, when they are full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth, to make it fruitful, till they are wearied and spent with watering it, Job, 37. 11. Are the heavens thus bountiful to the poor earth, that is so far below them, and wilt thou grudge thy bounty to thy poor brother, who is bone of thy bone?—Or thus; some will say, Though we give but little to the poor, yet, thank God, we have as charitable a heart as any. Nay, says Solomon, if the clouds be full of rain, they will empty themselves; if there be charity in the heart, it will shew itself, Jam. 2. 15, 16. He that draws out his soul to the hungry will reach forth his hand to them as he has ability.

2. Some will say that their sphere of usefulness is low and narrow, they cannot do the good that they see others can, who are in more public stations, and therefore they will sit still, and do nothing. Nay, says he, in the place where the tree falls, or happens to be, there it shall be, for the benefit of those to whom it belongs; every man must labour to be a blessing to that place, whatever it is, where the providence of God casts him; wherever we are, we may find good work to do, if we have but hearts to do it. Or thus; some will say, “Many present themselves as objects of charity who are unworthy, and I do not know whom it is fit to give it to.” “Trouble not thyself about that;” (says Solomon;) “give as discreetly as thou canst, and then be satisfied, that, though the person should prove undeserving of thy charity, yet, if thou give it with an honest heart, thou shalt not lose thy reward; which way soever the charity is directed, north or south, thine shall be the benefit of it.” This is commonly applied to death; therefore let us do good, and, as good trees, bring forth the fruits of righteousness, because death will shortly come, and cut us down, and we shall then be determined to an unchangeable state of happiness or misery, according to what was done in the body. As the tree falls at death, so it is likely to lie to all eternity.

3. Some will object the many discouragements they have met with in their charity; they have been reproached for it as proud and pharisaical; they have but little to give, and they shall be despised, if they do not give as others do; they know not but their children may come to want it, and they had better lay it up for them; they have taxes to pay, and purchases to make; they know not what use will be made of their charity, nor what construction will be put upon it; these, and a hundred such objections, he answers in one word; (v. 4.) He that observes the wind shall not sow, which signifies doing good; and he that regards the clouds shall not reap, which signifies getting good; if we stand thus magnifying every little difficulty, and making the worst of it, starting objections, and fancying hardship and danger where there is none, we shall never go on, much less go through, with our work, nor make any thing of it. If the husbandman should decline or leave off sowing for the sake of every flying cloud, and reaping for the sake of every blast of wind, he would make but an ill account of his husbandry at the year's end. The duties of religion are as necessary as sowing and reaping, and will turn as much to our own advantage; the discouragements we meet with in these duties are but as winds and clouds, which will do us no harm; and which those that put on a little courage and resolution will despise and easily break through. Note, Those that will be deterred and driven off by small and seeming difficulties from great and real duties, will never bring any thing to pass in religion, for there will always arise some wind, some cloud or other, at least in our imagination, to discourage us. Winds and clouds are in God's hands, are designed to try us, and our Christianity obliges us to endure hardness.

4. Some will say, "We do not see in which way what we expend in charity should ever be made up to us, we do not find ourselves ever the richer; why should we depend upon the general promise of a blessing on the charitable, unless we saw which way to expect the operation of it?" To this he answers, "Thou knowest not the work of God, nor is it fit thou shouldst; thou mayest be sure he will make good his word of promise, though he does not tell thee how or which way, and though he works in a way by himself, according to the councils of his unsearchable wisdom; he will work, and none shall hinder; but then he will work, and none shall direct or prescribe to him; the blessing shall work insensibly, but irresistibly; God's work shall certainly agree with his word, whether we see it or no." Our ignorance of the work of God he shews in two instances. (1.) We know not what is the way of the Spirit; of the wind, so some; we know not whence it comes, or whither it goes, or when it will turn; yet the seamen lie ready waiting for it, till it turns about in favour of them; so we must do our duty, in expectation of the time appointed for the blessing. Or it may be understood of the human soul; we know that God made us, and gave us these souls, but how they entered into these bodies, are united to them, animate them, and operate upon them, we know not; the soul is a mystery to itself, no marvel then that the work of God is so to us. (2.) We know not how the bones are fashioned in the womb of her that is with child; we cannot describe the manner either of the formation of the body, or of its information with a soul; both, we know, are the work of God, and we acquiesce in his work, but cannot, in either, trace the process of the operation; we doubt not of the birth of the child that is conceived, though we know not how it is formed, nor need we doubt of the performance of the promise, though we perceive not how things work towards it. And we may well trust God to provide for us that which is convenient, without our anxious disquieting cares, and therein to recompense us for our charity, since it was without any knowledge or forecast of our's, that our bodies were curiously wrought in secret, and our souls found the way into them; and so the argument is the same, and urged to the same intent, with that of our Saviour, (Matth. 6. 25.) The life, the living soul that God has given us, is more than meat; the body, that God has made us, is more than raiment; let him therefore that has done the greater for us be cheerfully depended upon to do the lesser.

5. Some say, "We have been charitable, have given a great deal to the poor, and never yet saw any return for it; many days are past, and we have not found it again." To which he answers, (v. 6.) "Yet go on, proceed and persevere in well-doing, let slip no opportunity. In the morning, sow thy seed upon the objects of charity that offer themselves early, and, in the evening, do not withhold thy hand, under pretence that thou art weary; as thou hast opportunity, be doing good, some way or other, all the day long, as the husbandman follows his seedness from morning till night. In the morning of youth, lay out thyself to do good; give out of the little thou hast to begin the world with; and, in the evening of old age, yield not to the common temptation old people are in to be penurious; even then withhold not thy hand, and think not to excuse thyself from charitable works by purposing to make a charitable will, but do good to the last, for thou knowest not which work of charity and piety shall prosper, both as to others and as to thyself, this or that, but hast reason to hope that both shall be alike good. Be not weary of well-doing, for in due season, in God's time, and that is the best time, you shall reap." Gal. 6. 9. This is applicable to spiritual charity, our pious endeavours for the good of the souls of others; let us continue them, for, though we have long laboured in vain, we may at length see the success of them. Let ministers, in the days of their seedness, sow both morning and evening; for who can tell which shall prosper?

7. Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun: 8. But if a man live many years, and rejoice in them all; yet let him remember the days of darkness; for they shall be many. All that cometh is vanity. 9. Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment. 10. Therefore remove sorrow from thy heart, and put away evil from thy flesh: for childhood and youth are vanity.

Here is an admonition both to old people and to young people, to think of dying, and get ready for it. Having, by many excellent precepts, taught us how to live well, the preacher comes now, toward the close of his discourse, to teach us how to die well, and to put us in mind of our latter end.

1. He applies himself to the aged, writes to them as fathers, to awaken them to think of death, v. 7, 8. Here is,

1. A rational concession of the sweetness of life, which old people find by experience; Truly the light is sweet; the light of the sun is so; it is a pleasant thing for the eyes to behold it; light was the first thing made in the formation of the great world, as the eye is one of the first in the formation of the body, the little world; it is pleasant to see the light, the heathen were so charmed with the pleasure of it, that they worshipped the sun; it is pleasant by it to see other things, the many agreeable prospects this world gives us; the light of life is so. Light is put for life, Job. 3. 20, 23. It cannot be denied that life is sweet; it is sweet to bad men, because they have their portion in this life; it is sweet to good men, because they have this life as the time of their preparation for a better life; it is sweet to all men; nature says it is so, and there is no disputing against it; nor can death be desired for its own sake, but dreaded, unless as a period to present evils, or a passage to future good. Life is sweet, and therefore we have need to double a guard upon ourselves, lest we love it too well.

2. A caution to think of death, even in the midst of life, and of life when it is most sweet, and we are most apt to forget death; If a man live many years, yet let him remember the days of darkness are coming. Here is, (1.) A summer's day supposed to be enjoyed—that life may continue long, even many years, and that, by the goodness of God, it may be made comfortable, and a man may rejoice in them all. There are those that live many years in this world, escape many dangers, receive many mercies, and therefore are secure that they shall want no good, and that no evil shall befall them, that the pitcher which has come so often from the well, safe and sound, shall never come home broken. But who are they that live many years, and rejoice in them all? Alas! none; we have but hours of joy for months of sorrow. However, some rejoice in their years, their many years, more than others; if these two things meet, a prosperous state, and a cheerful spirit, these two indeed may do much towards enabling a man to rejoice in them all, and yet the most prosperous state has its allays, and the most cheerful spirit has its damps; jovial sinners have their melancholy qualms, and cheerful saints have their gracious sorrows; so that it is but a supposition, not a case in fact, that a man should live many years, and rejoice in them all. But, (2.) Here is a winter's night proposed to be expected, after this summer's day; yet let this hearty old man remember the days of darkness, for they shall be many. Note, [1.] There are days of darkness coming, the days of our lying in the grave; there the body will lie in the dark, there the eyes see not, the sun shines not. The darkness of death is opposed to the light of life, the grave is a land of darkness, Job, 10. 21. [2.] Those days of darkness will be many; the days of our lying under ground will be more than the days of our living above ground. They are many, but they are not infinite; many as they are, they will be numbered and finished when the heavens are no more, Job, 14. 12. As the longest day will have its night, so the longest night will have its morning. [3.] It is good for us often to remember those days of darkness, that we may not be lifted up with pride, nor lulled asleep in carnal security, nor even transported into indecencies by vain mirth. [4.] Notwithstanding the long continuance of life, and the many comforts of it, yet we must remember the days of darkness, because those will certainly come, and they will come with much the less terror, if we have thought of them before.

II. He applies himself to the young, and writes to them as children, to awaken them to think of death; (v. 9, 10.) here we have,

1. An ironical concession to the vanities and pleasures of youth; Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth. Some make this to be the counsel which the atheist and the epicure give to the young man, the poisonous suggestions against which Solomon, in the close of the verse, prescribes a powerful antidote. But it is more emphatical, if we take it, as it is commonly understood, by way of irony, like that of Elijah to the priests of Baal, Cry aloud, for he is a god; or of Micaiah to Ahab, Go to Ramoth-Gilead, and prosper; or of Christ to his disciples, Sleep on now. "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth live a merry life, follow thy sports, and take thy pleasures: let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, cheer thee with its fancies and foolish hopes; entertain thyself with thy pleasing dreams, walk in the ways of thy heart, do whatever thou hast a mind to do, and stick at nothing that may gratify the sensual appetite; Quicquid libet licet—Make thy will thy law; walk in the ways of thy heart, and let thine heart walk after thine eyes, a rambling heart after a roving eye; what is pleasing to thine own eyes do it, whether it be pleasing in the eyes of God or no." Solomon speaks thus ironically to the young man, to intimate, (1.) That this is that which he would do, and which he would fain have leave to do, in which he places his happiness, and on which he sets his heart. (2.) That he wishes all about him would give him this counsel, would prophesy to him such smooth things as these, and cannot brook any advice to the contrary, but reckons those his enemies that bid him be sober and serious. (3.) To expose his folly, and the great absurdity of a voluptuous vicious course of life; the very description of it, if men would see things entirely, and judge of them impartially, is enough to shew how contrary to reason those act that live such a life. The very opening of the cause is enough to determine it without any argument. (4.) To shew, that, if men give themselves to such a course of life as this, it is just with God to give them up to it, to abandon them to their own hearts' lusts, that they may walk in their own counsels, Hos. 4. 17.

2. A powerful check given to these vanities and pleasures; "Know thou, that for all these things God shall bring thee into judgment, and duly consider that, and then live such a luxurious life, if thou canst, if thou darest." This is a κολασθηριον—a corrective to the foregoing concession, and plucks in the reins he had laid on the neck of the young man's lust. "Know then, for a certainty, that, if thou dost take such a liberty as this, it will be thy everlasting ruin, thou hast to do with a God who will not let it go unpunished." Note, (1.) There is a judgment to come. (2.) We must every one of us be brought into judgment, however we may now put far from us that evil day. (3.) We shall be reckoned with for all our carnal mirth and sensual pleasures in that day. (4.) It is good for all, but especially for young people, to know and consider this, that they may not, by the indulgence of their youthful lusts, treasure up unto themselves wrath against that day of wrath, the wrath of the Lamb.

3. A word of caution and exhortation inferred from all this, v. 10. Let young people look to themselves, and manage well both their souls and their bodies, their heart and their flesh. (1.) Let them take care that their minds be not lifted up with pride, or disturbed with anger, or any sinful passion; Remove sorrow, or anger, from thy heart; the word signifies any disorder or perturbation of the mind. Young people are apt to be impatient of check and controul, to vex and fret at any thing that is humbling and mortifying to them, and their proud hearts rise against every thing that crosses and contradicts them. They are so set upon that which is pleasing to sense, that they cannot bear any thing that is displeasing, but it goes with sorrow to their heart; their pride often disquiets them, and makes them uneasy. "Put that away, and the love of the world, and lay thine expectations low from the creature, and then disappointments will not be occasions of sorrow and anger to thee." Some by sorrow here understand that carnal mirth described v. 9. the end of which will be bitterness and sorrow. Let them keep at a distance from every thing which will be sorrow in the reflection. (2.) Let them take care that their bodies be not defiled by intemperance, uncleanness, or any fleshly lusts; "Put away evil from the flesh, and let not the members of thy body be instruments of unrighteousness. The evil of sin will be the evil of punishment, and that which thou art fond of, as good for the flesh, because it gratifies the appetites of it, will prove evil, and hurtful to it, and therefore put it far from thee, the further the better."

The preacher, to enforce his admonition both to old and young, urges, as an effectual argument, that which is the great argument of his discourse, the vanity of all present things, their uncertainty and insufficiency.

1. He reminds old people of this; (v. 8.) All that comes is vanity; yea, though a man live many years, and rejoice in them all. All that is come already, and all that is yet to come, how much soever men promise themselves from the concluding scenes, it is all vanity. What will be will do no more to make men happy than what has been. All that come into the world are vanity; they are altogether so, at their best estate.

2. He reminds young people of this; Childhood and youth are vanity. The dispositions and actions of childhood and youth have in them a great deal of impertinence and iniquity, sinful vanity, which young people have need to watch against, and get cured. The pleasures and advantages of childhood and youth have in them no certainty, satisfaction, or continuance; they are passing away; these flowers will soon wither, and these blossoms fall; let them therefore knit them into good fruit, which will continue and abound to a good account.

CHAP. XII.

The wise and penitent preacher is here closing his sermon; and he closes it, not only like a good orator, but like a good preacher, with that which was likely to make the best impressions, and which he wished might be powerful and lasting upon his hearers. Here is, I. An exhortation to young people to begin betimes to be religious, and not to put it off to old age, (v. 1.) enforced with arguments taken from the calamities of old age, (v. 1..5.) and the great change that death will make upon us, v. 6, 7. II. A repetition of the great truth he had undertaken to prove in this discourse, the vanity of the world, v. 8. III. A confirmation and recommendation of what he had written in this and his other books, as worthy to be duly weighed and considered, v. 9..12. IV. The whole matter summed up and concluded with a charge to all to be truly religious, in consideration of the judgment to come, v. 13, 14.

1. REMEMBER now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them; 2. While the sun, or the light, or the moon, or the stars, be not darkened, nor the clouds return after the rain: 3. In the day when the keepers of the house shall tremble, and the strong men shall bow themselves, and the grinders cease because they are few, and those that look out of the windows be darkened, 4. And the doors shall be shut in the streets, when the sound of the grinding is low, and he shall rise up at the voice of the bird, and all the daughters of music shall be brought low; 5. Also when they shall be afraid of that which is high, and fears shall be in the way, and the almond-tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burthen, and desire shall fail: because man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets: 6. Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern. 7. Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.

Here is,

I. A call to young people to think of God, and mind their duty to him, when they are young; Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth. This is, 1. The royal preacher's application of his sermon concerning the vanity of the world, and every thing in it. "You that are young flatter yourselves with expectations of great things from it, but believe those that have tried, it yields no solid satisfaction to a soul; therefore, that you may not be deceived by this vanity, nor too much disturbed by it, remember your Creator, and so guard yourselves against the mischiefs that arise from the vanity of the creature." 2. It is the royal physician's antidote against the particular diseases of youth, the love of mirth, and the indulgence of sensual pleasures, the vanity which childhood and youth are subject to; to prevent and cure this, remember thy Creator. Here is, (1.) A great duty pressed upon us, to remember God as our Creator; not only to remember that God is our Creator, that he made us, and not we ourselves, and is therefore our rightful Lord and Owner, but we must engage ourselves to him with the considerations which his being our Creator lays us under, and pay him the honour and duty which we owe him as our Creator. Remember thy Creators; the word is plural, as it is, Job, 35. 10. Where is God my Makers? For God said, Let us make man, us, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. (2.) The proper season for this duty; in the days of thy youth; the days of thy choice, so some; thy choice days, thy choosing days. "Begin, in the beginning of thy days, to remember him from whom thou badst thy being, and go on according to that good beginning. Call him to mind when thou art young, and keep him in mind throughout all the days of thy youth, and never forget him. Guard thus against the temptations of youth, and thus improve the advantages of it."

II. A reason to enforce this command; While the evil days come not, and the years, of which thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them. Do it quickly,

1. "Before sickness and death come; do it while thou livest, for it will be too late to do it when death has removed thee from this state of trial and probation to that of recompence and retribution." The days of sickness and death are the days of evil, terrible to nature, evil days indeed to those that have forgotten their Creator; these evil days will come, sooner or later; as yet they come not; for God is long-suffering to us-ward, and gives us space to repent; the continuing of life is but the deferring of death, and, while life is continued and death deferred, it concerns us to prepare, and get the property of death altered, that we may die comfortably.

2. Before old age comes, which, if death prevent not, will come, and they will be years, of which we shall say, We have no pleasure in them; when we shall not relish the delights of sense, as Barzillai, (2 Sam. 19. 35.) when we shall be loaded with bodily infirmities, old and blind, or old and lame; when we shall be taken off from our usefulness, and our strength shall be labour and sorrow; when we shall either have parted with our relations, and all our old friends, or be afflicted in them, and see them weary of us; when we shall feel ourselves die by inches; these years draw nigh, when all that comes will be vanity, the remaining months all months of vanity, and there will be no pleasure but in the reflection of a good life on earth, and the expectation of a better life in heaven.

These two arguments he enlarges upon in the following verses, only inverting the order, and shews,

(1.) How many are the calamities of old age, and that, if we should live to be old, our days will be such as we shall have no pleasure in: which is a good reason why we should return to God, and make our peace with him, in the days of our youth, and not put it off till we come to be old; for it will be no thanks to us to leave the pleasures of sin, when they have left us, nor to return to God, when need forces us; it is the greatest absurdity and ingratitude imaginable, to give the cream and flower of our days to the Devil, and reserve the bran and refuse and dregs of them for God; this is offering the torn, and the lame, and the sick, for sacrifice; and besides, old age being thus clogged with infirmities, it is the greatest folly imaginable to put off that needful work till then, which requires the best of our strength, when our faculties are in their prime, and especially to make the work more difficult by a longer continuance in sin, and, laying up treasures of guilt in the conscience, to add to the burthens of age, and make them much heavier. If the calamities of age will be such as are here represented, we shall have need of something to support and comfort us then, and nothing will be more effectual to do that than the testimony of our consciences for us, that we began betimes to remember our Creator, and have not since laid aside the remembrance of him. How can we expect God should help us when we are old, if we will not serve him when we are young? See Ps. 71. 17, 18.

The decays and infirmities of old age are here elegantly described in figurative expressions, which have some difficulty in them to us now, who are not acquainted with the common phrases and metaphors used in Solomon's age and language; but the general scope is plain—to shew how uncomfortable, generally, the days of old age are.

[1.] Then the sun and the light of it, the moon and the stars, and the light which they borrow from it, will be darkened; they look dim to old people, in consequence of the decay of their sight; their countenance is clouded, and the beauty and lustre of it are eclipsed; their intellectual powers and faculties, which are as lights in the soul, are weakened; their understanding and memory fail them, and their apprehension is not so quick, nor their fancy so lively, as it has been; (light is often put for joy and prosperity;) the days of their mirth are over, and they have not pleasure either of the converse of the day, or the repose of the night, for both the sun and the moon are darkened to them.

[2.] Then the clouds return after the rain; as, when the weather is disposed to wet, no sooner is one cloud blown over than another succeeds it, so it is with old people, when they are got free from one pain or ailment, they are seized with another, so that their distempers are like a continual dropping in a very rainy day. The end of one trouble is, in this world, but the beginning of another, and deep calls unto deep. Old people are often afflicted with defluxions of rheum, like soaking rain, after which still more clouds return, feeding the humour, so that it is continually grievous, and therein the body, as it were, melts away.

[3.] Then the keepers of the house tremble; the head, which is as the watch-tower, shakes, and the arms and hands, which are ready for the preservation of the body, shake too, and grow feeble, upon every sudden approach and attack of danger; that vigour of the animal spirits, which used to be exerted for self-defence, fails, and cannot do its office; old people are easily dispirited and discouraged.

[4.] Then the strong men shall bow themselves; the legs and thighs, which used to support the body, and bear its weight, bend, and cannot serve for labour, as they have done, but are soon tired. Old men, that have been in their time strong men, are become weak, and stoop for age, Zech. 8. 4. God takes no pleasure in the legs of a man, (Ps. 147. 10.) for their strength will soon fade; but in the Lord Jehovah there is everlasting strength, he has everlasting arms.

[5.] Then the grinders cease, because they are few; the teeth, with which we grind our meat, and prepare it for concoction, cease to do their part, because they are few; they are rotted and broken, and perhaps have been drawn, because they ached; some old people have lost all their teeth, and others have but few left; and this infirmity is the more considerable, because the meat, not being well chewed, for want of teeth, is not well digested, which has as much an influence as any thing upon the other decays of age.

[6.] Those that look out of the windows are darkened; the eyes wax dim, as Isaac's, (Gen. 27. 1.) and Ahijah's, 1 Kings, 14. 4. Moses was a rare instance of one, who, when 120 years old, had good eye-sight, but ordinarily, the sight decays in old people as soon as any thing, and it is a mercy to them that art helps nature with spectacles. We have need to improve our sight well while we have it, because the light of the eyes may be gone before the light of life.

[7.] The doors are shut in the streets; old people keep within doors, and care not for going abroad to entertainments; the lips, the doors of the mouth, are shut in eating, because the teeth are gone, and the sound of the grinding with them is low, so that they have not command of their meat in their mouths, which they used to have; they cannot digest their meat, and therefore little grist is brought to the mill.

[8.] Old people rise up at the voice of the bird; they have no sound sleep as young people have, but a little thing disturbs them, even the chirping of a bird; they cannot rest, for coughing, and therefore rise up at cock-crowing, as soon as any body is stirring; or they are apt to be jealous, and timorous, and full of care, which breaks their sleep, and makes them rise early; or they are apt to be superstitious, and rise up, as in a fright, at those voices of birds, of ravens, or screech-owls, which soothsayers call ominous.

[9.] With them, all the daughters of music are brought low; they have neither voice nor ear, can neither sing themselves, nor take any pleasure, as Solomon had done in the days of his youth, in singing men and singing women, and musical instruments, ch. 2. 8. Old people grow hard of hearing, and unapt to distinguish sounds and voices.

[10.] They are afraid of that which is high, afraid to go to the top of any high place, either because, for want of breath, they cannot reach it, or, their heads being giddy, or, their legs failing them, they dare not venture to it; or they frighten themselves with fancies, that that which is high will fall upon them. Fear is in the way; they can neither ride nor walk with their usual boldness, but are afraid of every thing that lies in their way, lest it throw them down.

[11.] The almond-tree flourishes; the old man's hair is grown white, so that his head looks like an almond-tree in the blossom. The almond-tree blossoms before any other tree, and therefore fitly shews what haste old age makes in seizing upon men; it prevents their expectations, and comes faster upon them than they thought of. Gray hairs are here and there upon them, and they perceive it not.

[12.] The grasshopper is a burthen, and desire fails. Old men can bear nothing, the lightest thing sits heavy upon them, both on their bodies and on their minds, a little thing sinks and breaks them; perhaps the grasshopper was some food that was looked upon to be very light of digestion; John Baptist's meat was locusts; but even that lies heavy upon an old man's stomach, and therefore desire fails, he has no appetite to his meat, neither shall he regard the desire of woman, as that king, Dan. 11. 37. Old men become mindless and listless, and the pleasures of sense are to them tasteless and sapless.

It is probable that Solomon wrote this when he was himself old, and could speak feelingly of the infirmities of age, which perhaps grew the faster upon him, for the indulgence he had given himself in sensual pleasures. Some old people bear up better than others under the decays of age, but, more or less, the days of old age are and will be evil days, and of little pleasure. Great care therefore should be taken to pay respect and honour to old people, that they may have something to balance their grievances, and nothing may be done to add to them. And all this put together makes up a good reason why we should remember our Creator in the days of our youth, that he may remember us with favour, when these evil days come, and his comforts may delight our souls when the delights of sense are in a manner worn off.

(2.) He shews how great a change death will make with us, which will be either the prevention or the period of the miseries of old age. Nothing else will keep them off, nor any thing else cure them. "Therefore remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth, because death is certainly before thee, perhaps it is very near thee, and it is a serious thing to die, and thou shouldst feel concerned with the utmost care and diligence to prepare for it."

[1.] Death will fix us in an unchangeable state; Man shall then go to his long home, and all these infirmities and decays of age are harbingers of, and advances toward, that awful remove. At death, man goes from this world, and all the employments and enjoyments of it; he is gone for good and all, as to his present state; he is gone home; for here he was a stranger and pilgrim; both soul and body go to the place whence they came, v. 7. He is gone to his rest, to the place where he is to fix. He is gone to his home; to the house of his world, so some; for this world is not his. He is gone to his long home; for the days of his lying in the grave will be many. He is gone to his house of eternity; not only to his house whence he shall never return to this world, but to the house where he must be for ever. This should make us willing to die, that at death we must go home; and why should we not long to go to our Father's house? And this should quicken us to get ready to die, that we must then go to our long home, to an everlasting habitation.

[2.] Death will be an occasion of sorrow to our friends that lo us; when man goes to his long home, the mourners go about the streets, the real mourners, and those, as now with us, distinguished by their habits as they go along the streets; the mourners for ceremony, that were hired to weep for the dead, both to express and to excite the real mourning. When we die, we not only remove to a melancholy house before us, but we leave a melancholy house behind us. Tears are a tribute due to the dead, and this, among other circumstances, makes it a serious thing to die. But in vain do we go to the house of mourning, and see the mourners go about the streets, if it do not help to make us serious and pious mourners in the closet.

[3.] Death will dissolve the frame of nature, and take down the earthly house of this tabernacle, which is elegantly described, v. 6. Then shall the silver cord, by which soul and body were wonderfully fastened together, be loosed, that sacred knot untied, and those old friends be forced to part; then shall the golden bowl, which held the waters of life for us, be broken; then shall the pitcher, with which we used to fetch up water, for the constant support of life, and the repair of its decays, be broken, even at the fountain, so that it can fetch up no more, and the wheel, all those organs that serve for the collecting and distributing of nourishment, shall be broken, and disabled to do their office any more; the body shall become like a watch when the spring is broken, the motion of all the wheels is stopped, and they all stand still; the machine is taken to pieces; the heart beats no more, nor does the blood circulate. Some apply this to the ornaments and utensils of life; rich people must, at death, leave behind them their clothing and furniture of silver and gold, and poor people their earthen pitchers, and the drawers of water will have their wheel broken.

[4.] Death will resolve us into our first principles, v. 7. Man is a strange sort of creature, a ray of heaven united to a clod of earth; at death, these are separated, and each goes to the place whence it came.

First, The body, that clod of clay, returns to its own earth, it is made of the earth; Adam's body was so, and we are of the same mould; it is a house of clay, at death it is laid in the earth, and in a little time will be resolved into earth, not to be distinguished from common earth, according to the sentence, (Gen. 3. 19.) Dust thou art, and therefore to dust thou shalt return. Let us not therefore indulge the appetites of the body, nor pamper it, (it will be worms' meat shortly,) nor let sin reign in our mortal bodies, for they are mortal, Rom. 6. 12.

Secondly, The soul, that beam of light, returns to that God, who, when he made man of the dust of the ground, breathed into him the breath of life, to make him a living soul, (Gen. 2. 7.) and forms the spirit of every man within him. When the fire consumes the wood, the flame ascends, when the ashes return to the earth out of which the wood grew. The soul does not die with the body; it is redeemed from the power of the grave; (Ps. 49. 15.) it can subsist without it, and will in a state of separation from it, as the candle burns, and burns brighter, when it is taken out of the dark lanthorn. It removes to the world of spirits, to which it is allied. It goes to God as a Judge, to give account of itself, and to be lodged either with the spirits in prison, (1 Pet. 3. 19.) or with the spirits in paradise, (Luke, 23. 43.) according to what was done in the body. This makes death terrible to the wicked, whose souls go to God as an Avenger; and comfortable to the godly, whose souls go to God as a Father, into whose hands they cheerfully commit them, through a Mediator, out of whom sinners may justly dread to think of going to God.

8. Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher; all is vanity. 9. And moreover, because the preacher was wise, he still taught the people knowledge; yea, he gave good heed, and sought out, and set in order many proverbs. 10. The preacher sought to find out acceptable words; and that which was written was upright, even words of truth. 11. The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails fastened by the masters of assemblies, which are given from one shepherd. 12. And further, by these, my son, be admonished: of making many books there is no end; and much study is a weariness of the flesh.

Solomon is here drawing towards a close, and is loath to part, till he has gained his point, and prevailed with his hearers, with his readers, to seek for that satisfaction in God only, and in their duty to him, which they can never find in the creature.

I. He repeats his text, v. 8. 1. As that which he had fully demonstrated the truth of, and so made good his undertaking in this sermon, wherein he had kept close to his text, and both his reasons and his application were to the purpose. 2. As that which he desired to inculcate both upon others and upon himself; to have it ready, and to make use of it, upon all occasions; we see it daily proved, let it therefore be daily improved; Vanity of vanities, all is vanity.

II. He recommends what he had written upon this subject, by divine direction and inspiration, to our serious consideration. The words of this book are faithful, and well-worthy our acceptance, for,

1. They are the words of one that was a convert, a penitent, that could speak by dear-bought experience of the vanity of the world, and the folly of expecting great things from it. He was Cohleleth, one gathered in from his wanderings, and gathered home to that God from whom he had revolted. Vanity of vanities, saith the penitent. All true penitents are convinced of the vanity of the world, for they find it can do nothing to ease them of the burthen of sin, which they complain of.

2. They are the words of one that was wise, wiser than any;

endued with extraordinary measures of wisdom; famous for it among his neighbours, who all sought unto him, to hear his wisdom, and therefore a competent judge of this matter; not only wise as a prince, but wise as a preacher—and preachers have need of wisdom to win souls.

3. He was one that made it his business to do good, and to use wisdom aright; Because he was himself wise, but knew he had not his wisdom for himself, any more than he had it from himself, he still taught the people that knowledge which he had found useful to himself, and hoped might be so to them too. It is the interest of princes to have their people well taught in religion, and no disparagement to them to teach them themselves the good knowledge of the Lord, but their duty to encourage those whose office it is to teach them, and to speak comfortably to them, 2 Chron. 30. 22. Let not the people, the common people, be despised, no not by the wisest and greatest as either unworthy or incapable of good knowledge; even those that are well-taught, have need to be still taught, that they may grow in knowledge.

4. He took a great deal of pains and care to do good, designing to teach the people knowledge; he did not put them off with any thing that came next to hand, because they were inferior people, and he a very wise man, but, considering the worth of the souls he preached to, and the weight of the subject he preached on, he gave good heed to what he read and heard from others, that, having stocked himself well, he might bring out of his treasury things new and old. He gave good heed to what he spake and wrote himself, and was choice and exact in it; all he did was elaborate. (1.) He chose the most profitable way of preaching, by proverbs, or short sentences, which would be more easily apprehended and remembered than long and laboured periods. (2.) He did not content himself with a few parables, or wise sayings, and repeat them again and again, but he furnished himself with many proverbs, a great variety of grave discourses, that he might have something to say on every occasion. (3.) He did not only give them such observations as were obvious and trite, but he sought out such as were surprising and uncommon; he digged into the mines of knowledge, and did not only pick up what lay on the surface. (4.) He did not deliver his heads and observations at random, as they came to mind, but methodised them, and set them in order, that they might appear in more strength and lustre.

5. He put what he had to say in such a dress as he thought would be most pleasing; He sought to find out acceptable words, words of delight; (v. 10.) he took care that good matter might not be spoiled by bad strife, and by the ungratefulness and incongruity of the expression. Ministers should study, not for big words, or for fine words, but acceptable words, such as are likely to please men for their good, to edification, 1 Cor. 10. 33. They that would win souls must contrive how to win upon them with words fitly spoken.

6. That which he wrote for our instruction is of unquestionable certainty, and what we may rely upon; That which was written was upright and sincere, according to the real sentiments of the penman, even words of truth, the exact representation of the thing as it is. Those are sure not to miss their way who are guided by these words. What good will acceptable words do us, if they be not upright, and words of truth? Most are for smooth things, that flatter them, rather than right things, that direct them; (Isa. 30. 10.) but to those that understand themselves, and their own interest, words of truth will always be acceptable words.

7. That which he and other holy men wrote, will be of great use and advantage to us, especially being inculcated upon us by the exposition of it, v. 11. Here observe, (1.) A double benefit accruing to us from divine truths, if duly applied and improved; they are profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and instruction in righteousness. They are of use, [1.] To excite us to our duty; they are as goads to the ox that draws the plough, putting him forward when he is dull, and quickening him, to mend his pace. The truths of God prick men to the heart, (Acts, 2. 37.) and put them upon bethinking themselves, when they trifle and grow remiss, and exerting themselves with more vigour in their work. While our good affections are so apt as they are, to grow flat and cool, we have need of these goads. [2.] To engage us to persevere in our duty; they are as nails to those that are wavering and inconstant, to fix them to that which is good; they are as goads to such as are dull, and draw back, and nails to such as are desultory, and draw aside; means to establish the heart, and confirm good resolutions, that we may not sit loose to our duty, nor ever be taken off from it, but that what good there is in us may be as a nail fastened in a sure place, Ezra, 9. 8. (2.) A double way of communicating divine truths, in order to these benefits. [1.] By the scriptures, as the standing rule, the words of the wise, of the prophets, who are called wise men, Matth. 23. 34. These we have in black and white, and may have recourse to them at any time, and make use of them as goads and as nails; by them we may teach ourselves, let them but come with pungency and power to the soul, let the impressions of them be deep and durable, and they will make us wise to salvation. [2.] By the ministry; to make the words of the wise more profitable to us, it is appointed that they should be impressed and fastened by the masters of assemblies. Solemn assemblies for religious worship are an ancient divine institution, intended for the honour of God and the edification of his church, and are not only serviceable, but necessary, to those ends. There must be masters of these assemblies, who are Christ's ministers, and, as such, are to preside in them, to be God's mouth to the people, and their's to God. Their business is to fasten the words of the wise, and drive them as nails to the head, in order to which, the word of God is likewise as a hammer, Jer. 23. 29.

8. That which is written, and thus recommended to us, is of divine origin. Though it comes to us through various hands, (many wise men, and many masters of assemblies,) yet it is given by one and the same shepherd, the great shepherd of Israel, that leads Joseph like a flock, Ps. 80. 1. God is that one Shepherd, whose good Spirit indited the scriptures, and assists the masters of the assemblies in opening and applying the scriptures. These words of the wise are the true sayings of God, on which we may rest our souls; from that one Shepherd all ministers must receive what they deliver, and speak according to the light of the written word.

9. The sacred inspired writings, if we will but make use of them, are sufficient to guide us in the way to true happiness, and we need not, in the pursuit of that, to toil ourselves with the search of other writings; (v. 12.) And further, nothing now remains but to tell thee that of making many books there is no end; (1.) Of writing many books. If what I have written, serve not to convince thee of the vanity of the world, and the necessity of being religious, neither wouldest thou be convinced, if I should write ever so much. "If the end be not attained in the use of those books of scripture which God has blessed us with, neither should we obtain the end, if we had twice as many more; nay, if we had so many, that the whole world could not contain them, (John, 21. 25.) and much study of them would but confound us, and would rather be a weariness to the flesh than any advantage to the soul; we have as much as God saw fit to give us, saw fit for us, and saw us fit for. Much less can it be expected that those who will not by these be admonished, should be wrought upon by other writings. Let men write ever so many books for the conduct of human life, write till they have tired themselves with much study, they cannot give better instructions than those we have from the word of God. Or, (2.) Of buying many books, making ourselves masters of them, and masters of what is in them, by much study; still the desire of learning would be unsatisfied; it will give a man indeed the best entertainment, and the best accomplishment, this world can afford him, but if we be not by these admonished of the vanity of the world, and human learning, among other things, and its insufficiency to make us happy without true piety, alas, there is no end of it, nor real benefit by it; it will weary the body, but never give the soul any true satisfaction. The great Mr. Selden subscribed to this, when he owned that in all the books he had read, he never found that on which he could rest his soul, but in the holy scripture, especially Tit. 2. 11, 12. By these therefore let us be admonished.

13. Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter; Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. 14. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil.

The great inquiry which Solomon prosecutes in this book, is, What is that good which the sons of men should do? ch. 2. 3. What is the true way to true happiness, the certain means to attain our great end? He had in vain sought it among those things which most men are eager in pursuit of, but here, at length, he has found it, by the help of that discovery which God anciently made to man, (Job, 28. 28.) That serious godliness is the only way to true happiness; Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter, the return entered upon the writ of inquiry, the result of this diligent search; you shall have all I have been driving at in two words. He does not say, Do you hear it, but, Let us hear it; for preachers must themselves be hearers of that word which they preach to others; must hear it as from God; those are teachers by the halves, who teach others, and not themselves, Rom. 2. 21. Every word of God is pure and precious, but some words are worthy of more special remark, as this here; the Masorites begin it with a capital letter, as that Deut. 6. 4. Solomon himself puts a nota bene before it, demanding attention in these words, Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter. Observe here,

1. The summary of religion. Setting aside all matters of doubtful disputation, to be religious, is, to fear God, and keep his commandments. (1.) The root of religion is the fear of God reigning in the heart; a reverence of his majesty, a deference to his authority, and a dread of his wrath. Fear God, worship God, give him the honour due to his name, in all the instances of true devotion, inward and outward. See Rev. 14. 7. (2.) The rule of religion is the law of God revealed in the scriptures. Our fear toward God must be taught by his commandments, (Isa. 29. 13.) and those we must keep, and carefully observe. Wherever the fear of God is uppermost in the heart, there will be a respect to all his commandments, and care to keep them. In vain do we pretend to fear God, if we do not make conscience of our duty to him.

2. The vast importance of it; This is the whole of man; it is all his business, and all his blessedness; our whole duty is summed up in this, and our whole comfort is bound up in this. It is the concern of every man, and ought to be his chief and continual care; it is the common concern of all men, of their whole time. It is nothing to a man whether he be rich or poor, high or low, but it is the main matter, it is all to a man, to fear God, and do as he bids him.

3. A powerful inducement to this, v. 14. We shall see of what vast consequence it is to us, that we be religious, if we consider the account we must every one of us shortly give of ourselves to God; thence he argued against a voluptuous and vicious life, (ch. 11. 9.) and here for a religious life. God shall bring every work into judgment. Note, (1.) There is a judgment to come, in which every man's eternal state will be finally determined. (2.) God himself will be the Judge, God-man will, not only because he has a right to judge, but because he is perfectly fit for it; infinitely wise and just. (3.) Every work will then be brought into judgment, will be inquired into, and called over again. It will be a day to bring to remembrance every thing done in the body. (4.) The great thing to be then judged of concerning every work, is, whether it be good or evil, conformable to the will of God, or a violation of it. (5.) Even secret things, both good and evil, will be brought to light, and brought to account, in the judgment of the great day; (Rom. 2. 16.) there is no good work, no bad work, hid, but shall then be made manifest. (6.) In consideration of the judgment to come, and the strictness of that judgment, it highly concerns us now to be very strict in our walkings with God, that we may give up our account with joy.

AN E X P O S I T I O N,
 WITH Practical Observations, OF THE
S O N G O F S O L O M O N.

All scripture, we are sure, is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for the support and advancement of the interests of his kingdom among men, and it is never the less so for there being found in it some things dark and hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable, wrest to their own destruction. In our belief both of the divine extraction, and of the spiritual exposition, of this book, we are confirmed by the ancient, constant, and concurring, testimony, both of the church of the Jews, to whom were committed the oracles of God, and who never made any doubt of the authority of this book, and of the Christian church, which happily succeeds them in that trust and honour.

- I. It must be confessed, on the one hand, that if he who rarely reads this book, be asked, as the eunuch was, Understandest thou what thou readest? he will have more reason than he had to say, How can I, except some man shall guide me? The books of scripture-history and prophecy are very like one another, but this Song of Solomon's is very unlike the songs of his father David; there is not the name of God in it, it is never quoted in the New Testament, we find not in it any expressions of natural religion, or pious devotion, no, nor is it introduced by vision, or any of the marks of immediate revelation; it seems as hard as any part of scripture to be made a savour of life unto life, nay, and to those who come to the reading of it with carnal minds, and corrupt affections, it is in danger of being made a savour of death unto death; it is a flower out of which they extract poison; and therefore the Jewish doctors advised their young people not to read it till they were thirty years old, lest by the abuse of that which is most pure and sacred, (horrendum dictu—horrible to say!) the flames of lust should be kindled with fire from heaven, which is intended for the altar only. But,
- II. It must be confessed, on the other hand, that, with the help of the many faithful guides we have for the understanding of this book, it appears to be a very bright and powerful ray of heavenly light, admirably fitted to excite pious and devout affections in holy souls, to draw out their desires toward God, to increase their delight in him, and improve their acquaintance and communion with him. It is an allegory, the letter of which kills those who rest in that, and look no further, but the spirit of which gives life, 2 Cor. 3. 6. John. 6. 63. It is a parable, which makes divine things more difficult to those who do not love them, but more plain and pleasant to those who do, Matth. 13. 14, 16. Experienced Christians here find a counterpart of their experiences, and to them it is intelligible, while they neither understand it, nor relish it, who have no part or lot in the matter. It is a song, an Epitholamium, or nuptial song, wherein, by the expressions of love between a bridegroom and his bride, are set forth, and illustrated, the mutual affections that pass between God and a distinguished remnant of mankind. It is a pastoral; the bride and bridegroom, for the more lively representation of humility and innocence, are brought in as a shepherd and his shepherdess. Now, 1. This song might easily be taken in a spiritual sense by the Jewish church, for whose use it was first composed, and was so taken. as appears by the Chaldee-Paraphrase and the most ancient Jewish expositors. God betrothed the people of Israel to himself, he entered into covenant with them, and it was a marriage-covenant. He had given abundant proofs of his love to them, and required of them that they should love him with all their heart and soul. Idolatry was often spoken of as spiritual adultery, and doting upon idols, to prevent which, this song was penned, representing the complacency which God took in Israel, and which Israel ought to take in God, and encouraging them to continue faithful to him, though he might seem sometimes to withdraw and hide himself from them, and to wait for the further manifestation of himself in the promised Messiah. 2. It may more easily be taken in a spiritual sense by the Christian church, because the condescensions and communications of divine love appear more rich and free under the gospel than they did under the law, and the communion between heaven and earth more familiar. God sometimes spake of himself as the Husband of the Jewish church, (Isa. 64. 5. Hos. 2. 16, 19.) and rejoiced in it as his bride, Isa. 62. 4, 5. But more frequently is Christ represented as the Bridegroom of his church, (Matth. 25. 1. Rom. 7. 4. 2 Cor. 11. 2. Eph. 5. 32.) and the church as the bride, the Lamb's wife, Rev. 19. 7.—21. 2, 9. Pursuant to this metaphor, Christ and the church in general, Christ and particular believers, are here discoursing with abundance of mutual esteem and endearment. The best key to this book is the 45th Psalm, which we find applied to Christ in the New Testament, and therefore this ought to be so too. It requires some pains to find out what may, probably, be the meaning of the Holy Spirit in the several parts of this book: as David's songs are many of them level to the capacity of the meanest, and there are shallows in them, in which a lamb may wade, so this of Solomon's will exercise the capacities of the most learned, and there are depths in it, in which an elephant may swim. But, when the meaning is found out, it will be of admirable use to excite pious and devout affections in us; and the same truths which are plainly laid down in other scriptures, when they are extracted out of this, come to the soul with a more pleasing power. When we apply ourselves to the study of this book, we must not only, with Moses and Joshua, put off our shoe from off our foot, and even forget that we have bodies, because the place where we stand is holy ground, but we must, with John, come up hither, must spread our wings, take a noble flight, and soar upward, till by faith and holy love we enter into the holiest, for this is no other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven.

CHAP. I.

In this chapter, after the title of the book, (v. 1.) we have Christ and his church, Christ and a believer, expressing their esteem for each other. I. The bride, the church, speaks to the Bridegroom, (v. 2..4.) to the daughters of Jerusalem, (v. 5, 6.) and then to the Bridegroom, v. 7. II. Christ, the Bridegroom, speaks in answer to the complaints and request of his spouse, v. 8..11. III. The church expresses the great value she has for Christ, and the delights she takes in communion with him, v. 12..14. IV. Christ commends the church's beauty, v. 15. V. The church returns the commendation, v. 16, 17. Where there is a fire of true love to Christ in the heart, this will be of use to blow it up into a flame.

1. THE song of songs, which is Solomon's.

We have here the title of this book, shewing,

1. The nature of it; it is a song, that it might the better answer the intention, which is to stir up the affections, and to heat them, which poetry will be very instrumental to do. The subject is pleasing, and therefore fit to be treated of in a song, in singing of which we may make melody with our hearts unto the Lord. It is evangelical; and gospel-times should be times of joy, for gospel-grace puts a new song into our mouths, Ps. 98. 1.

2. The dignity of it; it is the song of songs, a most excellent song; not only above any human composition, or above all the other songs which Solomon penned, but even above any other of the scripture-songs, as having more of Christ in it.

3. The penman of it; it is Solomon's; it is not the song of fools, as many of the songs of love are, but the song of the wisest of men; nor can any man give a better proof of his wisdom than to celebrate the love of God to mankind, and to excite his own love to God, and that of others with it. Solomon's songs were a thousand and five; (1 Kings, 4. 32.) those that were of other subjects are lost, but this of seraphic love remains, and will, to the end of time. Solomon, like his father, was addicted to poetry, and, which way soever a man's genius lies, he should endeavour to honour God, and edify the church, with it. One of Solomon's names was Jedidiah, beloved of the Lord; (2 Sam. 12. 25.) and none so fit to write of the Lord's love, as he that had himself so great an interest in it; none of all the apostles wrote so much of love, as he that was himself the beloved disciple, and lay in Christ's bosom. Solomon, as a king, had great affairs to mind and manage, which took up much of his thoughts and time, yet he found heart and leisure for this and other religious exercises. Men of business ought to be devout men, and not to think that their business will excuse them from that which is every man's great business—to keep up communion with God. It is not certain when Solomon penned this sacred song; some think that he penned it after he recovered himself by the grace of God from his backslidings, as a further proof of his repentance, and as if, by doing good to many with this song, he would atone for the hurt he had perhaps done with loose, vain, amorous, songs, when he loved many strange wives; now he turned his wit the right way. It is more probable that he penned it in the beginning of his time, while he kept close to God, and kept up his communion with him; and perhaps he put this song, with his father's psalms, into the hands of the chief musician, for the service of the temple, not without a key to it, for the right understanding of it. Some think that it was penned upon occasion of his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter, but that is uncertain; the tower of Lebanon, which is mentioned in this book, (ch. 7. 4.) was not built, as it is supposed, till long after that marriage. We may reasonably think that when in the height of his prosperity he loved the Lord, (1 Kings, 3. 3.) he thus served him with joyfulness and gladness of heart in the abundance of all things. It may be rendered, The song of songs, which is concerning Solomon, who, as the son and successor of David, on whom the covenant of royalty was entailed, as the founder of the temple, and as one that excelled in wisdom and wealth, was a type of Christ, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and yet is a greater than Solomon; this is therefore a song concerning him. It is here fitly placed after Ecclesiastes; for when by that book we are thoroughly convinced of the vanity of the creature, and its insufficiency to satisfy us, and make a happiness for us we shall be quickened to seek for happiness in the love of Christ, and that true transcendent pleasure which is to be found only in communion with God through him. The voice in the wilderness, that was to prepare Christ's way, cried, All flesh is grass.

2. Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth: for thy love is better than wine. 3. Because of the savour of thy good ointments, thy name is as ointment poured forth, therefore do the virgins love thee. 4. Draw me, we will run after thee: the king hath brought me into his chambers: we will be glad and rejoice in thee, we will remember thy love more than wine: the upright love thee. 5. I am black, but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, as the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon. 6. Look not upon me, because I am black, because the sun hath looked upon me: my mother's children were angry with me; they made me the keeper of the vineyards, but mine own vineyard have I not kept.

The spouse, in this dramatic poem, is here first introduced addressing herself to the Bridegroom, and then to the daughters of Jerusalem.

I. To the Bridegroom; not giving him any name or title, but beginning abruptly, Let him kiss me; like Mary Magdalen to the supposed Gardener, (John, 20. 15.) If thou have borne him hence, meaning Christ, but not naming him; the heart had been before taken up with the thoughts of him, and to this relative those thoughts were the antecedent, that good matter which the heart was inditing, Ps. 45. 1. They that are full of Christ themselves are ready to think that others should be so too.

Two things the spouse desires, and pleases herself with the thoughts of.

1. The Bridegroom's friendship; (v. 2.) "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth"; be reconciled to me, and let me know that he is so, let me have the tokens of his favour." Thus the Old-Testament church desired Christ's manifesting himself in the flesh, to be no longer under the law as a school-master, under a dispensation of bondage and terror, but to receive the communications of divine grace in the gospel, in which God is reconciling the world unto himself, binding up and healing what by the law was torn and smitten; as the mother kisses the child that she has chidden. "Let him no longer send to me, but come himself; no longer speak by angels and prophets, but let me have the words of his own mouth, those gracious words, (Luke, 4. 22.) which will be to me as the kisses of his mouth, sure tokens of reconciliation, as Esau's kissing Jacob was." All gospel-duty is summed up in our kissing the Son; (Ps. 2. 12.) so all gospel-grace is summed up in his kissing us, as the father of the prodigal kissed him when he returned a penitent. It is a kiss of peace. Kisses are opposed to wounds; (Prov. 27. 6.) so are the kisses of grace to the wounds of the law. Thus all true believers earnestly desire the manifestations of Christ's love to their souls; they desire no more to make them happy than the assurances of his favour, the lifting up of the light of his countenance upon them, (Ps. 4. 6, 7.) and the knowledge of that love of his which passes knowledge; this is the one thing they desire, Ps. 27. 4. They are ready to welcome the manifestation of Christ's love to their souls by his Spirit, and to return them in the humble professions of love to him, and complacency in him, above all. "The fruit of his lips is peace," Isa. 57. 19. Let him give me ten thousand kisses, whose very "fruition makes me desire him the more, and whereas all other "pleasures sour and wither by using, those of the Spirit become "more delightful." So Bishop Reynolds.

She gives several reasons for this desire.

(1.) Because of the great esteem she had for his love: Thy love is better than wine. Wine makes glad the heart, revives the drooping spirits, and exhilarates them, but gracious soulstake more pleasure in loving Christ, and being loved of him, in the fruits and gifts of his love, and in the pledges and assurances of it, than any man ever took in the most exquisite delights of sense, and it is more reviving to them than ever the richest cordial was to one ready to faint. Note, [1.] Christ's love is in itself, and in the account of all the saints, more valuable and desirable than the best entertainments this world can give. [2.] Those only may expect the kisses of Christ's mouth, and the comfortable tokens of his favour, who prefer his love before all the delights of the children of men, who would rather forego those delights than forfeit his favour, and take more pleasure in spiritual joys than in any bodily refreshments whatsoever. Observe here the change of the person; Let him kiss me; there she speaks of him as absent, or as if she was afraid to speak to him; but, in the next words, she sees him near at hand, and therefore directs her speech to him, "Thy love, thy loves," (so the word is,) "I so earnestly desire, because I highly esteem it."

(2.) Because of the diffusive fragrantcy of his love, and the fruits of it; (v. 3.) "Because of the savour of thy good ointment, the agreeableness and acceptableness of thy graces and comforts to all that rightly understand both them and themselves, thy name is an ointment poured forth, thou art so, and all that whereby thou hast made thyself known; thy very name is precious to all the saints, it is an ointment and perfume which rejoices the heart." The unfolding of Christ's name is as the opening of a box of precious ointment, which the room is filled with the odour of; the preaching of his gospel was the manifesting of the savour of his knowledge in every place, 2 Cor. 2. 14. The Spirit was the oil of gladness wherewith Christ was anointed, (Heb. 1. 9.) and all true believers have that unction. (1 John, 2. 27.) so that he is precious to them, and they to him, and to one another. A good name is a precious ointment, but Christ's name is more fragrant than any other. Wisdom, like oil, makes the face to shine; but the Redeemer outshines, in beauty, all others. The name of Christ is not now like ointment sealed up, as it had been long, (Ask not after my name, for it is secret;) but like ointment poured forth; which denotes both the freeness and the fulness of the communications of his grace by the gospel.

(3.) Because of the general affection that all holy souls have to him; Therefore do the virgins love thee. It is Christ's love shed abroad in our hearts, that draws them out in love to him; all that are pure from the corruptions of sin, that preserve the elasticity of their own spirits, and are true to the vows by which they have devoted themselves to God, that not only suffer not their affections to be violated, but cannot bear so much as to be solicited by the world and the flesh, those are the virgins that love Jesus Christ, and follow him whithersoever he goes, Rev. 14. 4. And because Christ is the Darling of all the pure in heart, let him be our's, and let our desire be toward him and toward the kisses of his mouth.

2. The Bridegroom's fellowship, v. 4. Observe here,

(1.) Her petition for divine grace; Draw me. This implies sense of distance from him, desire of union with him; "Draw me to thyself, draw me nearer, draw me home to thee." She had prayed that he would draw nigh to her; (v. 2.) in order to that, she prays that he would draw her nigh to him. "Draw me, not only with the moral suasion which there is in the fragrantcy of the good ointments, not only with the attractives of that name which is as ointment poured forth, but with supernatural grace, with the cords of a man and the hands of love," Hos. 11. 4. Christ has told us that none come to him but such as the Father draws, John, 6. 44. We are not only weak, and cannot come of ourselves any further than we are helped, but we are naturally backward and averse to come, and therefore must pray for those influences and operations of the Spirit, by the power of which we are of unwilling made willing, Ps. 110. 3. "Draw me, else I move not; overpower the world and the flesh that would draw me from thee." We are not driven to Christ, but drawn in such a way as is agreeable to rational creature.

(2.) Her promise to improve that grace; Draw me, and then we will run after thee. See how the doctrine of special and effectual grace consists with our duty, and is a powerful engagement and encouragement to it, and yet reserves all the glory of all the good that is in us to God only. Observe, [1.] The flowing forth of the soul after Christ, and its ready compliance with him, are the effect of his grace; we could not run after him, if he did not draw us, 2 Cor. 3. 5. Phil. 4. 13. [2.] The grace which God gives us we must diligently improve; when Christ by his Spirit draws us, we must with our spirits run after him. As God says, I will, and you shall, (Ezek. 36. 27.) so we must say, "Thou shalt, and we will; thou shalt work in us both to will and to do, and therefore we will work out our own salvation;" (Phil. 2. 12, 13.) not only we will walk, but we will run, after thee; this denotes eagerness of desire, readiness of affection, vigour of pursuit, and swiftness of motion. When thou shalt enlarge my heart, then I will run the way of thy commandments; (Ps. 119. 32.) when thy right hand upholds me, then my soul follows hard after thee; (Ps. 63. 8.) when with loving-kindness to us he draws us, (Jer. 31. 3.) we with loving-kindness to him must run after him, Isa. 40. 31. Observe the difference between the petition and the promise; "Draw me, and then we will run." When Christ pours out his Spirit upon the church in general, which is his bride, all the members of it do thence receive enlivening quickening influences, and are made to run to him with the more cheerfulness, Isa. 55. 5. Or, "Draw me," (says the believing soul,) "and then I will not only follow thee myself as fast as I can, but will bring all mine along with me; We will run after thee, I and the virgins that love thee," (v. 3.) I and all that I have any interest in, or influence upon, I and my house, (Josh. 24. 15.) I and the transgressors, whom I will teach thy ways," Ps. 51. 13. Those that put themselves forth, in compliance with divine grace, shall find that their zeal will provoke many, 2 Cor. 9. 2. Those that are lively will be active; when Philip was drawn to Christ, he drew Nathanael; and they will be exemplary, and so will win those that would not be won by the word.

(3.) The immediate answer that was given to this prayer; The King has drawn me, has brought me into his chambers. It is not so much an answer fetched by faith from the word of Christ's grace, as an answer fetched by experience from the workings of his grace. If we observe, as we ought, the returns of prayer, we may find that sometimes, while we are yet speaking, Christ hears, Isa. 65. 24. The Bridegroom is a King; so much the more wonderful is his condescension in the invitations and entertainments that he gives us, and so much the greater reason have we to accept of them, and to run after him. God is the King that has made the marriage-supper for his Son, (Matth. 22. 2.) and brings in even the poor and the maimed, and even the most shy and bashful are compelled to come in. They that are drawn to Christ are brought not only into his courts, into his palaces, (Ps. 45. 15.) but into his presence-chamber, where his secret is with them, (Ps. 25. 14.) where he is free with them, (John, 14. 21.) and where they are safe in his pavilion, Ps. 27. 5. Isa. 26. 20. Those that wait at wisdom's gates, shall be made to come (so the word is) into her chambers, they shall be led into truth and comfort.

(4.) The wonderful complacency which the spouse takes in the honour which the king put upon her. Being brought into the chamber, [1.] "We have what we would have; our desires are crowned with unspeakable delights; all our griefs vanish, and we will be glad and rejoice. If a day in the courts, much more an hour in the chambers, is better than a thousand, than ten thousand, elsewhere." They that are, through grace, brought into covenant and communion with God, have reason to go on their way rejoicing, as the eunuch; (Acts, 8. 39.) and that joy will enlarge our heart, and be our strength, Neh. 8. 10. [2.] "All our joy shall centre in God; We will rejoice, not in the ointments, or the chambers, but in thee. It is God only that is our exceeding Joy, Ps. 43. 4. We have no joy but in Christ, and which we are indebted to him for." Gaudium in Domino—Joy in the Lord, was the ancient salutation, and Salus in Domino sempiterna—Eternal salvation in the Lord. [3.] "We will retain the relish and savour of this kindness of thine, and never forget it; we will remember thy loves more than wine; not only thy love itself, (v.2.) but the very remembrance of it, shall be more grateful to us than the strongest cordial to the spirits, or the most palatable liquor to the taste. We will remember to give thanks for thy love, and it shall make more durable impressions upon us than any thing in this world."

(5.) The communion which a gracious soul has with all the saints in this communion with Christ. In the chambers to which we are brought, we not only meet with him, but meet with one another; (1 John, 1. 7.) for the upright love thee; the congregation, the generation, of the upright love thee. Whatever others do, all that are Israelites indeed, and faithful to God, will love Jesus Christ. Whatever differences of apprehension and affection there may be among Christians in other things, this they are all agreed in, Jesus Christ is precious to them. The upright here are the same with the virgins, v. 3. All that remember his love more than wine, will love him with a superlative love. Nor is any love acceptable to Christ but the love of the upright, love in sincerity, Eph. 6. 24.

II. The spouse applies herself to the daughters of Jerusalem, v. 5, 6. The church in general, being in distress, speaks to particular churches to guard them against the danger they were in, of being offended at the church's sufferings, 1 Thess. 3. 3. Or, the believer speaks to those that were professors at large in the church, but not of it; or to weak Christians, babes in Christ, that labour under much ignorance, infirmity, and mistake, not perfectly instructed, and yet willing to be taught, in the things of God. She observed these by-standers look disdainfully upon her, because of her blackness, in respect both of sins and sufferings, upon the account of which they thought she had little reason to expect the kisses she wished for, (v. 2.) or to expect that they should join with her in her joys, v. 4. She therefore endeavours to remove this offence; she owns she is black: guilt blackens; the heresies, scandals, and offences, that happen in the church, make her black; and the best saints have their failings; sorrow blackens, that seems to be especially meant; the church is often in a low condition, mean, and poor, and in appearance despicable; her beauty sullied, and her face foul with weeping; she is in mourning weeds, clothed with sackcloth, as the Nazarites that were become *black*er than a coal, Lam. 4. 8.

Now, to take off this offence,

1. She asserts her own comeliness notwithstanding; (v. 5.) I am black, but comely; black as the tents of Kedar, in which the shepherds lived, which were very coarse, and never whitened, weather-beaten and discoloured by long use; but comely as the curtains of Solomon, the furniture of whose rooms, no doubt, was sumptuous and rich, in proportion to the stateliness of his houses. The church is sometimes black with persecution, but comely in patience, constancy, and consolation, and never the less amiable in the eyes of Christ; black in the account of men, but comely in God's esteem; black in some that are a scandal to her, but comely in others that are sincere, and are an honour to her. True believers are black in themselves, but comely in Christ, with the comeliness that he puts upon them; black outwardly, for the world knows them not, but all glorious within, Ps. 45. 13. St. Paul was weak, and yet strong; (2 Cor. 12. 10.) and so the church is black, and yet comely; a believer is a sinner, and yet a saint; his own righteousness are as filthy rags, but he is clothed with the robe of Christ's righteousness. The Chaldee Paraphrase applies it to the people of Israel's blackness when they made the golden calf, and their comeliness when they repented of it.

2. She gives an account how she came to be so black. The blackness was not natural, but contracted, and was owing to the hard usage that had been given her; Look not upon me, so scornfully, because I am black. We must take heed with what eye we look upon the church, especially when she is in black. Thou shouldst not have looked upon the day of thy brother, the day of his affliction, Obad. 12. Be not offended; for,

(1.) I am black, by reason of my sufferings; The sun has looked upon me. She was fair and comely, whiteness was her proper colour, but she got this blackness by the burthen and heat of the day, which she was forced to bear. She was sun-burnt, scorched with tribulation and persecution; (Matth. 13. 6, 21.) and the greatest beauties, if exposed to the weather, are soonest tanned. Observe how she mitigates her troubles; she does not say, as Jacob, (Gen. 31. 40.) In the day the drought consumed me, but, The sun has looked upon me; for it becomes not God's suffering people to make the worst of their sufferings. But what was the matter? [1.] She fell under the displeasure of those of her own house; My mother's children were angry with me. She was in perils by false brethren: her foes were those of her own house, (Matth. 10. 36.) brethren by nature, as men; by profession, members of the same sacred corporation; the children of the church her mother, but not of God her Father; they were angry with her. The Samaritans, who claimed kindred to the Jews, were vexed at any thing that tended to the prosperity of Jerusalem, Neh. 2. 10. Note, It is no new thing for the people of God to fall under the anger of their own mother's children. It was thou, a man, mine equal, Ps. 55. 12, 13. This makes the trouble the more irksome and grievous; from such it is taken unkindly; and the anger of such is implacable; a brother offended is hard to be won. [2.] They dealt very hardly with her; They made me the keeper of the vineyards; First, "They seduced me to sin, drew me into false worship, to serve their gods, which was like dressing their vineyards, keeping the vine of Sodom; and they would not let me keep my own vineyard, serve my own God, and observe those pure worship which he gave me in charge, and which I do, and ever will, own for mine." These are the grievances which good people complain most of in a time of persecution, that their consciences are forced, and that those, who rule them with rigour, say to their souls, Bow down, that we may go over, Isa. 51. 23. Or, Secondly, "They brought me into trouble, imposed that upon me which was toilsome, and burthensome, and very disgraceful." Keeping the vineyards was base, servile, work, and very laborious, Isa. 61. 5. Her mother's children made her the drudge of the family. Cursed be their anger for it was fierce, and their wrath for it was cruel. The spouse of Christ has met with a great deal of hard usage.

(2.) "My sufferings are such as I have deserved; for my own vineyard have I not kept. How unrighteous soever my brethren are in persecuting me, God is righteous in permitting them to do so. I am justly made a slavish keeper of men's vineyards, because I have been a careless keeper of the vineyard God has intrusted me with." Slothful servants of God are justly made to serve their enemies, that they may know his service, and the service of the kings of the countries, 2 Chron. 12. 8. Deut. 28. 47, 48. Ezek. 20. 23, 24. "Think not the worse of the ways of God for my sufferings, for I smart for my own folly." Note, When God's people are oppressed and persecuted, it becomes them to acknowledge their own sin to be the procuring cause of their troubles, especially that carelessness in keeping their vineyards, so that it has been like the field of the slothful.

7. Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon: for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions? 8. If thou know not, O thou fairest among women, go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock, and feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents. 9. I have compared thee, O my love, to a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots. 10. Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, thy neck with chains of gold. 11. We will make thee borders of gold with studs of silver.

Here is,

I. The humble petition which the spouse presents to her Beloved, the shepherdess to the Shepherd, the church and every believer to Christ, for a more free and intimate communion with him. She turns from the daughters of Jerusalem, to whom she had complained both of her sins and of her troubles, and looks up to heaven for relief and succour against both, v. 7. Where observe, 1. The title she gives to Christ, O thou whom my soul loveth. Note. It is the undoubted character of all true believers, that their souls love Jesus Christ, which intimates both the sincerity and the strength of their love; they love him with all their hearts; and they that do so may come to him boldly, and may humbly plead it with him. 2. The opinion she has of him as the good Shepherd of the sheep; she doubts not but he feeds his flock, and makes them rest at noon. Jesus Christ graciously provides both repast and repose for his sheep; they are not starved, but well-fed; not scattered upon the mountains, but fed together; fed in green pastures; and, in the hot time of the day, led by the still waters, and made to lie down under a cool refreshing shade. Is it with God's people a noon-time of outward troubles, inward conflicts? Christ has rest for them, he carries them in his arms, Isa. 40. 11. 3. Her request to him that she might be admitted into his society; Tell me where thou feedest. Those that would be told, that would be taught, what they are concerned to know and do, must apply themselves to Jesus Christ, and beg of him to teach them, to tell them. "Tell me where to find thee, where I may have conversation with thee, where thou feedest and tendest thy flock, that there I may have some of thy company." Observe, by the way, We should not, in love to our friends and their company, tempt them, or urge them, to neglect their business, but desire such an enjoyment of them as will consist with it, and, rather, if we can, to join with them in their business, and help to forward it. "Tell me where thou feedest, and there I will sit with thee, walk with thee, feed my flocks with thine, and not hinder thee or myself, but bring my work with me." Note, They, whose souls love Jesus Christ, earnestly desire to have communion with him, by his word in which he speaks to us, and by prayer in which we speak to him, and to share in the privileges of his flock; and we may learn from the care he takes of his church to provide convenient food and rest for it, how to take care of our own souls, which are our charge. 4. The plea she uses for the enforcing of this request; "For why should I be as one that turns aside by, or after, the flocks of thy companions, that pretend to be so, but are really thy competitors and rivals with thee." Note, Turning aside from Christ, after other lovers, is that which gracious souls dread, and deprecate, more than any thing else. "Thou wouldest not have me to turn aside, no, nor to be as one that turns aside; tell me then, O tell me, where I may be near thee, and I will never leave thee." (1.) "Why should I lie under suspicion, and look as if I belonged to some other, and not to thee? Why should I be thought by the flocks of our companions to be a deserter from thee, and a retainer to some other shepherd?" Good Christians will be afraid of giving any occasion to those about them to question their faith in Christ, and their love to him; they would not do anything that looks like unconcernedness about their souls, or uncharitableness toward their brethren, or that savours of indifference and disaffection to holy ordinances; and we should pray to God to direct us into, and keep us in, the way of our duty, that we may not so much as seem to come short, Heb. 4. 1. (2.) "Why should I lie in temptation to turn aside, as I do while I am absent from thee?" We should be earnest with God for a settled peace in communion with God through Christ, that we may not be as strays, ready to be picked up by him that next passes by.

II. The gracious answer which the Bridegroom gives to this request, v. 8. See how ready God is to answer prayer, especially prayers for instruction; even while she is yet speaking, he hears. Observe, 1. How affectionately he speaks to her; O thou fairest among women. Note, Believing souls are fair, in the eyes of the Lord Jesus, above any other. Christ sees a beauty in holiness, whether we do or no. The spouse had called herself black, but Christ calls her fair. Those that are low in their own eyes, are so much the more amiable in the eyes of Jesus Christ. Blushing at their own deformity (says Mr. Durham) is a chief part of their beauty. 2. How mildly he checks her for her ignorance, in these words, If thou know not, intimating that she might have known it, if it had not been her own fault. What! dost thou not know where to find me and my flock? Compare Christ's answer to a like address of Philip's, (John, 14. 9.) Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? But, 3. With what tenderness he acquaints her where she might find him. If men say, Lo, here is Christ, or, lo, he is there, believe them not, go not after them, Matth. 24. 23, 26. But, (1.) Walk in the way of good men; (Prov. 2. 20.) follow the track, ask for the good old way, observe the footsteps of the flock, and go forth by them. It will not serve to sit still, and cry, "Lord, shew me the way," but we must bestir ourselves to inquire out the way; and we may find it by looking which way the footsteps of the flock lead, what has been the practice of godly people all along; let that practice be our's, Heb. 6. 12. 1 Cor. 11. 1. (2.) Sit under the direction of good ministers; "Feed thyself, and thy kids, beside the tents of the under-shepherds: Bring thy charge with thee," (it is probable that the custom was to commit the lambs and kids to the custody of the women, the shepherdesses,) "they shall all be welcome; the shepherds will be no hinderance to thee, as they were to Rachel's daughters, (Exod. 2. 17.) but helpers rather, and therefore abide by their tents." Note, Those that would have acquaintance and communion with Christ, must closely and conscientiously adhere to holy ordinances, must join themselves to his people, and attend to his ministers. Those that have the charge of families, must bring them with them to religious assemblies; let their kids, their children, their servants, have the benefit of the shepherds' tents.

III. The high encomiums which the Bridegroom gives of his spouse. To be given in marriage, in the Hebrew dialect, is to be praised; (Ps. 78. 63. margin;) so this spouse is here; her husband praises this virtuous woman, (Prov. 31. 28.) he praises her, as is usual in poems, by similitudes. 1. He calls her his love; (v. 9.) it is an endearing compellation often used in this book; "My friend, my companion, my familiar." 2. He compares her to a set of strong and stately horses in Pharaoh's chariots. Egypt was famous for the best horses, Solomon had his from thence, and Pharaoh, no doubt, had the choicest the country afforded for his own chariots. The church had complained of her own weakness, and the danger she was in of being made a prey of by her enemies; "Fear not," says Christ; "I have made thee like a company of horses, I have put strength into thee as I have done into the horse, (Job, 39. 19.) so that thou shalt with a gracious boldness mock at fear, (and not be affrighted,) like the lion, Prov. 28. 1. The Lord has made thee as his goodly horse in the day of battle, Zech. 10. 3. I have compared thee to my company of horses which triumphed over Pharaoh's chariots, the holy angels, horses of fire." Hab. 3. 15. Thou didst walk through the sea with thine horses; and see Isa. 68. 13. We are weak in ourselves, but if Christ make us as horses, strong and bold, we need not fear what all the powers of darkness can do against us. 3. He admires the beauty and ornaments of her countenance; (v. 10.) Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, the attire of the head, curls of hair, or favourites, so some; or knots of ribands; thy neck also with chains, such as persons of the first rank wear, chains of gold. The ordinances of Christ are the ornaments of the church; the graces, gifts, and comforts of the Spirit, are the adorning of every believing soul, and beautify it; these render it, in the sight of God, of great price. The ornaments of the saints are many, but all orderly disposed in rows and chains, in which there is a mutual connexion with, and dependence upon, each other. The beauty is not from any thing in themselves, from the neck, or from the cheeks, but from the ornaments with which they are set off. It was comeliness which I put upon thee, saith the Lord God; for we were born not only naked, but polluted, Ezek. 16. 14.

IV. His gracious purpose to add to her ornaments; for where God has given true grace, he will give more grace; to him that has shall be given. Is the church courageous in her resistance of sin, as the horses in Pharaoh's chariots? Is she comely in the exercise of grace, as with rows of jewels, and chains of gold? She shall be yet further beautified; (v. 11.) We will make thee borders of gold, inlaid, or enamelled, with studs of silver. Whatever is wanting, shall be made up, till the church and every true believer come to be perfect in beauty; see Ezek. 16. 14. This is her un-undertaken to be done by the concurring power of the three persons in the Godhead; We will do it; like that, (Gen. 1. 26.) "Let us make man"; so let us new-make him, and perfect his beauty." The same that is the Author, will be the Finisher, of the good work; and it cannot miscarry.

12. While the king sitteth at his table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof. 13. A bundle of myrrh is my well-beloved unto me; he shall lie all night betwixt my breasts. 14. My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire in the vineyards of En-gedi. 15. Behold, thou art fair, my love; behold, thou art fair, thou hast doves' eyes. 16. Behold, thou art fair, my beloved, yea, pleasant: also our bed is green. 17. The beams of our house are cedar, and our rafters of fir.

Here the conference is carried on between Christ and his spouse, and endearments are mutually exchanged.

I. Believers take a great complacency in Christ, and in communion with him. To you that believe, he is precious, above any thing in this world, 1 Pet. 2. 7. Observe,

1. The humble reverence believers have for Christ as their Sovereign, r. 12. He is a King, in respect both of dignity and dominion; he wears the crown of honour, he bears the sceptre of power, both which are the unspeakable satisfaction of all his people. This King has his royal table spread in the gospel, in which is made for all nations a feast of fat things, Isa. 25. 6. Wisdom has furnished her table, Prov. 9. 1. He sits at this table to see his guests, (Matth. 22. 11.) to see that nothing be wanting that is fit for them: he sups with them, and they with him; (Rev. 3. 20.) he has fellowship with them, and rejoices in them; he sits at his table to bid them welcome, and to carve for them, as Christ brake the five loaves, and gave to his disciples, that they might distribute to the multitude; he sits there to receive petitions, as Ahasuerus admitted Esther's petition at the banquet of wine. He has promised to be present with his people in his ordinances always. Then believers do him all the honour they can, and study how to express their esteem of him, and gratitude to him, as Mary did when she anointed his head with the ointment of spikenard that was very costly, one pound of it worth three hundred pence, and so fragrant, that the house was filled with the pleasing odour of it; (John, 12. 3.) which story seems as if it were designed to refer to this passage, for Christ was then sitting at table. When good Christians, in any religious duty, especially in the ordinance of the Lord's supper, where the King is pleased, as it were, to sit with us at his own table, have their graces exercised, their hearts broken by repentance, healed by faith, and inflamed with holy love and desire towards Christ, and with joyful expectations of the glory to be revealed, then the spikenard sends forth the smell thereof; Christ is pleased to reckon himself honoured by it, and to accept of it as an instance of respect to him, as it was in the wise men of the East, who paid their homage to the new-born King of the Jews, by presenting to him frankincense and myrrh. The graces of God's Spirit in the hearts of believers are exceeding precious in themselves, and pleasing to Christ; and his presence in ordinances draws them out into act and exercise. If he withdraw, graces wither and languish, as plants in the absence of the sun; if he approach, the face of the soul is renewed, as of the earth in the spring; and then it is time to bestir ourselves, that we may not lose the gleam, nor lose the gale; for nothing is done acceptably, but what grace does, Heb. 12. 28.

2. The strong affection they have for Christ as their Beloved, their well-beloved, v. 13. Christ is not only beloved by all believing souls, but is their well-beloved, their best-beloved, their only beloved; he has that place in their hearts, which no rival can be admitted to, the innermost and uppermost place. Observe,

(1.) How Christ is accounted of by all believers; He is a bundle of myrrh, and a cluster of camphire, something, we may be sure, nay every thing, that is pleasant and delightful. The doctrine of his gospel, and the comforts of his Spirit, are very refreshing to them, and they rest in his love; none of all the delights of sense are comparable to the spiritual pleasure they have in meditating on Christ, and enjoying him. There is a complicated sweetness in Christ, and an abundance of it; there is a bundle of myrrh, and a cluster of camphire; we are not straitened in him in whom there is all fulness. The word translated camphire, is copher, the same word that signifies atonement or propitiation; Christ is a Cluster of merit and righteousness to all believers; therefore he is dear to them, because he is the propitiation for their sins. Observe what a stress the spouse lays upon the application; he is unto me, and again, unto me all that is sweet; whatever he is to others, he is so to me; he loved me, and gave himself for me; he is my Lord, and my God.

(2.) How he is accepted; He shall lie all night between my breasts, near my heart. Christ lays the beloved disciples in his bosom; why then should not they lay their beloved Saviour in their bosoms? why should not they embrace him with both arms, and hold him fast, with a resolution never to let him go? Christ must dwell in the heart, (Eph. 3. 17.) and, in order to that, the adulteries must be put from between the breasts; (Hos. 2. 2.) no pretender must have his place in the soul. He shall be as a bundle of myrrh or perfume bag, between my breasts, always sweet to me; or his effigies in miniature, his love-tokens, shall be hung between my breasts, according to the custom of those that are dear to each other. He shall not only be laid there for a while, but shall lie there, shall abide there.

II. Jesus Christ has a great complacency in his church, and in every true believer; they are amiable in his eyes; (v. 15.) Behold, thou art fair, my love; and again, Behold, thou art fair. He says this, not to make her proud, (humility is one principal ingredient in spiritual beauty,) but, 1. To shew that there is a real beauty in holiness; that all who are sanctified are thereby beautified; they are truly fair. 2. That he takes great delight in that good work which his grace has wrought on the souls of believers; so that, though they have their infirmities, whatever they think of themselves, and the world thinks of them, he thinks them fair. He calls them friends; the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, is in the sight of God of great price, 1 Pet. 3. 4. 3. To comfort weak believers, who are discouraged by their own blackness, let them be told again and again that they are fair. 4. To engage all who are sanctified to be very thankful for that grace which has made them fair, who by nature were deformed, and changed the Ethiopian's skin. One instance of the beauty of the spouse is here mentioned, that she has doves' eyes, as ch. 4. 1. Those are fair, in Christ's account, who have not the piercing eye of the eagle, but the pure and chaste eye of the dove; not like the hawk, who, when he soars upward, still has his eye upon the prey on earth; but a humble modest eye, such an eye as discovers a simplicity and godly sincerity, and a dove-like innocence. Eyes enlightened and guided by the Holy Spirit, that blessed Dove; weeping eyes; I did mourn as a dove, Ezek. 7. 16.

III. The church expresses her value for Christ, and returns esteem for esteem; (v. 16.) Behold, thou art fair. See how Christ and believers praise one another. Israel saith of God, Who is like thee? (Exod. 15. 11.) And God saith of Israel Who is like thee? (Deut. 33. 29.) Lord, saith the church, "Dost thou call me fair? No; if we speak of strength, thou art strong; (Job, 9. 19.) so, if of beauty, thou art fair; I am fair no otherwise than as I have thine image stamped upon me; thou art the great Original. I am but a faint and imperfect copy, I am but thine umbra—the shadow of thee; (John, 1. 16.—3. 34.) Thou art fair in thyself, and (which is more) pleasant to all that are thine. Many are fair enough to look at, and yet the sourness of their temper renders them unpleasant; but thou art fair, yea, pleasant." Christ is pleasant, as he is our's, in covenant with us, in relation to us. Thou art pleasant now, when the King sits at his table. Christ is always precious to believers, but in a special manner pleasant, when they are admitted into communion with him, when they hear his voice, and see his face, and taste his love. It is good to be here

Having expressed her esteem of her husband's person, she next, like a loving spouse, that is transported with joy for having disposed of herself so well, applauds the accommodations he had for her entertainment; his bed, his house, his rafters, or galleries, (v. 16.) which may fitly be applied to those holy ordinances in which believers have fellowship with Jesus Christ, receive the tokens of his love, and return their pious and devout affections to him, increase their acquaintance with him, and improve their advantages by him. Now, 1. These she calls our's, Christ and believers having a joint-interest in them. As husband and wife are heirs together, (1 Pet. 3. 7.) so believers are joint-heirs with Christ, Rom. 8. 17. They are his institutions, and their privileges; in them Christ and believers meet. She does not call them mine, for a believer will own nothing as his, but what Christ shall have an interest in; nor thine, for Christ has said, All that I have is thine, Luke, 15. 31. All is our's, if we are Christ's. They that can by faith lay claim to Christ may lay claim to all that is his. 2. These are the best of the kind. Does the colour of the bed, and the furniture belonging to it, help to set it off? Our bed is green, a colour which, in a pastoral, is preferred before any other, because it is the colour of the fields and groves, where the shepherd's business and delight are. It is a refreshing colour, good for the eyes, and it denotes fruitfulness. I am like a green olive tree, Ps. 52. 8. We are married to Christ, that we should bring forth unto God, Rom. 7. 4. The beams of our house are cedar; (v. 17.) which, probably, refers to the temple Solomon had lately built for communion between God and Israel, which was of cedar, a strong sort of wood, sweet, durable, and which will never rot, typifying the firmness and continuance of the church, the gospel-temple; the galleries for walking are of fir, or cypress, some sort of wood that was pleasing both to the sight and to the smell, intimating the delight which the saints take in walking with Christ, and conversing with him. Every thing in the covenant of grace, (on which foot all their treaties are carried on,) is very firm, very fine, and very fragrant.

CHAP. II.

In this chapter, I. Christ speaks both concerning himself, and concerning his church, v. 1, 2. II. The church speaks, 1. Remembering the pleasure and satisfaction she had in communion with Christ, v. 3, 4. 2. Entertaining herself with the present tokens of his favour, and taking care that nothing happen to intercept them, v. 5, 7. 3. Triumphant in his approaches toward her, v. 8, 9. 4. Repeating the gracious calls he had given her to go along with him a walking, invited by the pleasures of the returning spring, (v. 10. .13.) out of her obscurity, (v. 14.) and the charge he had given to the servants to destroy that which should be hurtful to his vineyard, v. 15. 5. Rejoicing in her interest in him, v. 16. 6. Longing for his arrival, v. 17. They whose hearts are filled with love to Christ, and hope of heaven, know best what these things mean.

1. I AM the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the vallies. 2. As the lily among thorns, so is my love among the daughters.

See here, 1. What Christ is pleased to compare himself to; and he condescends very much in the comparison; he that is the Son of the Highest, the bright and morning Star, calls and owns himself the Rose of Sharon, and the Lily of the vallies, to express his presence with his people in this world, the easiness of their access to him, and the beauty and sweetness which they find in him; and to teach them to adorn themselves with him, as shepherds and shepherdesses, when they appeared gay, were decked with roses and lilies, garlands and chaplets of flowers. The rose, for beauty and fragrant, is the chief of flowers, and our Saviour prefers the clothing of the lily before that of Solomon in all his glory. Christ is the Rose of Sharon, where, probably, the best roses grew, and in most plenty; the Rose of the field, so some; denoting that the gospel salvation is a common salvation; it lies open to all; whoever will may come, and gather the rose-buds of privileges and comforts that grow in the covenant of grace; he is not a Rose locked up in a garden, but all may come and receive benefit by him, and comfort in him. He is a Lily for whiteness, a Lily of the vallies for sweetness, for those which we call so are a strong perfume. He is a Lily of the vallies, or low places, in his humiliation, exposed to injury; humble souls see most beauty in him; whatever he is to others, to them that are in the vallies he is a Lily. He is the Rose, the Lily; there is none besides; whatever excellency is in Christ, it is in him singularly, and in the highest degree.

2. What he is pleased to compare his church to; (v. 2.) (1.) She is as a lily; he himself is the Lily, (v. 1.) she is as the lily; the beauty of believers consists in their conformity and resemblance to Jesus Christ; they are his love, and so they are as lilies, for those are made like Christ in whose hearts his love is shed abroad. (2.) As a lily among thorns; as a lily compared with thorns; the church of Christ as far excels all other societies, as a bed of roses excels a bush of thorns; as a lily compassed with thorns. The wicked, the daughters of this world, such as have no love to Christ, are as thorns, worthless and useless, good for nothing but to stop a gap; nay, they are noxious and hurtful, they came in with sin, and are a fruit of the curse; they choke good seed, and hinder good fruit, and their end is to be burned. God's people are as lilies among them, scratched and torn, shaded and obscured, by them; they are dear to Christ, and yet exposed to hardships and troubles in the world; they must expect it, for they are planted among thorns, (Ezek. 2. 6.) but they are nevertheless dear to him, he does not overlook or undervalue any of his lilies for their being among thorns. When they are among thorns, they must still be as lilies, must maintain their innocency and purity, and, though they are among thorns, must not be turned into thorns, must not render railing for railing, and if they thus preserve their character, they shall be still owned as conformable to Christ. Grace in the soul is a lily among thorns, corruptions are thorns in the flesh, (2 Cor. 12. 7.) are as Canaanites to God's Israel; (Josh. 23. 13.) but the lily that is now among thorns, shall shortly be transplanted out of this wilderness into that paradise where there is no pricking brier or grieving thorn, Ezek. 28. 24.

3. As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste. 4. He brought me to the banqueting-house, and his banner over me was love. 5. Stay me with flagons, comfort me with apples: for I am sick of love. 6. His left hand is under my head, and his right hand doth embrace me. 7. I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please.

Here,

I. The spouse commends her beloved, and prefers him before all others; As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, which perhaps does not grow so high, nor spread so wide, as some other trees, yet is useful and serviceable to man, yielding pleasant and profitable fruit, while the other trees are of little use, no, not the cedars themselves, till they are cut down, so is my Beloved among the sons, so far does he excel them all, all the sons of God, the angels; that honour was put upon him, which was never designed for them; (Heb. 1. 4.) all the sons of men; he is juiver, how much more does he excel than all, than the choicest of them, Ps. 45. 2. Name what creature you will, and you will find Christ has the pre-eminence above them all. The world is a barren tree to a soul, Christ is a fruitful one.

II. She remembers the abundant comfort she has had in communion with him; she sat down by him with great delight, as shepherds sometimes repose themselves, sometimes converse with one another, under a tree.

A double advantage she found in sitting down so near the Lord Jesus. 1. A refreshing shade; I sat down under his shadow, to be sheltered by him from the scorching heat of the sun, to be cooled, and so to take some rest. Christ is to believers as the sha- flow of a great tree, nay, of a great rock in a weary land, Isa. 32. 2.—25. 4. When a poor soul is parched with convictions of sin, and the terrors of the law, as David (Ps. 32. 4.) when fatigued with the troubles of this world, as Elijah when he sat down under the juniper tree, (1 Kings, 19. 4.) they find that in Christ, in his name, his graces, his comforts, and his undertaking for poor sinners, which revives them, and keeps them from fainting; they that are weary and heavy laden in Christ may find rest. It is not enough to pass by this shadow, but we must sit down under it; here will I dwell, for I have desired it; and we shall find it not like Jonah's gourd, that soon withered, and left him in a heat, both inward and outward, but like the tree of life, the leaves whereof were not only for shelter, but for the healing of the nations. We must sit down under this shadow with delight, must put an entire confidence in the protection of it, (as Judges, 9. 15.) and take an entire complacency in the refreshment of it. But that is not all. 2. Here is pleasing, nourishing, food; this tree drops its fruits to those that sit down under its shadow, and they are welcome to them, and will find them sweet unto their taste, whatever they are to others; believers have tasted that the Lord Jesus is gracious, (1 Pet. 2. 3.) his fruits are all the precious privileges of the new covenant, purchased by his blood, and communicated by his Spirit; promises are sweet to a believer, yea, and precepts too; I delight in the law of God after the inward man. Pardons are sweet, and peace of conscience sweet, assurances of God's love, joys of the Holy Ghost, the hopes of eternal life, and the present earnestness and fore-tastes of it, are sweet, all sweet to those that have their spiritual senses exercised. If our mouths be put out of taste for the pleasures of sin, divine consolations will be sweet to our taste, sweeter than honey and the honey-comb.

III. She owns herself obliged to Jesus Christ for all the benefit and comfort she had in communion with him; (v. 4.) "I sat down under the apple-tree, glad to be there, but he admitted me, nay, he pressed me, to a more intimate communion with him; Come in, thou blessed of the Lord, why standest thou without? He brought me to the house of wine, the place where he entertains his special friends; from lower to higher measures and degrees of comfort; from the fruit of the apple-tree to the more generous fruit of the vine. To him that values the divine joys he has, more shall be given. One of the rabbins, by the banqueting-house, understands the tabernacle of the congregation where the interpretation of the law was given; surely then we may apply it to Christian assemblies, where the gospel is preached, and gospel-ordinances are administered, particularly the Lord's supper, that banquet of wine especially to the inside of those ordinances, communion with God in them. Observe, 1. How she was introduced; "He brought me, wrought in me an inclination to draw nigh to God, helped me over my discouragements, took me by the hand, guided and led me, and gave me an access with boldness to God as a Father, Eph. 2. 18. We had never come into the banqueting-house, and never been acquainted with spiritual pleasures, if Christ had not brought us, by opening for us a new and living way, and opening in us a new and living fountain. 2. How she was entertained; His banner over me was love; he brought me in with a banner displayed over my head, not as one he triumphed over, but as one he triumphed in, and whom he always caused to triumph with him, and in him, 2 Cor. 2. 14. The gospel is compared to a banner, or ensign, (Isa. 11. 12.) and that which is represented in this banner, written in it in letters of gold, letters of blood, is love, love; and this is the entertainment in the banqueting-house. Christ is the Captain of our salvation, and he enlists all his soldiers under the banner of love; in that they centre, to that they must continually have an eye, and be animated by it; the love of Christ must constrain them to fight manfully. When a city was taken, the conqueror set up his standard in it; "He has conquered me with his love, overcome me with kindness, and that is the banner over me." This she speaks of as what she had formerly had experience of, and she remembers it with delight. Eaten bread must not be forgotten, but remembered with thankfulness to that God who has fed us with manna in this wilderness.

IV. She professes her strong affection and most passionate love to Jesus Christ; (v. 5.) I am sick of love, overcome, overpowered, by it. David explains this, when he says, (Ps. 119. 20.) My soul breaks for the longing that it has unto thy judgments, and, (v. 18.) My soul faints for thy salvation; languishing with care to make it sure, and fear of coming short of it. The spouse was now absent perhaps from her Beloved, waiting for his return, and cannot bear the grief and distance of delay. Oh how much better is it with the soul when it is sick of love to Christ, than when it is surfeited with the love of this world! She cries out for cordials; "Oh stay me with flagons, or ointments, or flowers, any thing that is reviving; comfort me with apples, with the fruits of that Apple-tree, Christ, (v. 3.) with the merit and mediation of Christ, and the sense of his love to my soul." Note, They that are sick of love to Christ, shall not want spiritual supports, while they are yet waiting for spiritual comforts.

V. She experiences the power and tenderness of divine grace, relieving her in her present faintings, v. 6. Though he seemed to have withdrawn, yet he was even then a very present Help, 1. To sustain the love-sick soul, and to keep it from fainting away; "His left hand is under my head, to bear it up, nay, as a pillow to lay it easy." David experienced God's hand upholding him then when his soul was following hard after God, (Ps. 63. 8.) and Job, in a state of desertion, yet found that God put strength into him, Job, 23. 6. All his saints are in his hand, which tenderly holds their aching heads. 2. To encourage the love-sick soul to continue waiting till he returns; "For, in the mean time, his right hand embraces me, and thereby gives me an unquestionable assurance of his love." Believers owe all their strength and comfort to the supporting left hand, and embracing right hand, of the Lord Jesus.

VI. Finding her Beloved thus nigh unto her she is in great care that her communion with him be not interrupted; (v. 7.) I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, Jerusalem, the mother of us all, charges all her daughters, the church charges all her members, the believing soul charges all its powers and faculties, the spouse charges herself, and all about her, not to stir up, or awake, her love until he please, now that he is asleep in her arms, as she was borne up in his, v. 6. She gives them this charge by the roes and the hinds of the field, by every thing that is amiable in their eyes, and dear to them, as the loving kind, and the pleasant roe; "My love is to me dearer than those can be to you, and will be disturbed, like them, with a very little noise." Note, 1. Those that experience the sweetness of communion with Christ, and the sensible manifestations of his love, cannot but desire the continuance of these blessed views, these blessed visits. Peter would make tabernacles upon the holy mount, Matth. 17. 4. 2. Yet Christ will, when he pleases, withdraw those extraordinary communications of himself, for he is a free Agent, and the Spirit, as the wind blows where and when it listeth, and in his pleasure it becomes us to acquiesce. But 3. Our case must be, that we do nothing to provoke him to withdraw, and to hide his face; that we carefully watch over our own hearts, and suppress every thought that may grieve his good Spirit. Let those that have comfort, be afraid of sinning it away.

8. The voice of my beloved! behold, he cometh leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills. 9. My beloved is like a roe or a young hart: behold, he standeth behind our wall, he looketh forth at the windows, shewing himself through the lattice. 10. My beloved spake, and said unto me, Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away. 11. For, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone. 12. The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land. 13. The fig-tree putteth forth her green figs and the vines with the tender grape give a good mell. Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away.

The church is here pleasing herself exceedingly with the thoughts of her further communion with Christ, after she is recovered from her fainting fit.

1. She rejoices in his approach, v. 8. (1.) She hears him speak; "It is the voice of my Beloved, calling to me to tell me he is coming." Like one of his own sheep, she knows his voice before she sees him, and can easily distinguish it from the voice of a stranger, (John, 10. 4, 5.) and, like a faithful friend of the Bridegroom, she rejoices greatly because of the Bridegroom's voice, John, 3. 29. With what an air of triumph and exultation does she cry out, "It is the voice of my Beloved, it can be the voice of no other, for none besides can speak to the heart, and make that burn." (2.) She sees him come, sees the goings of our God, our King, Ps. 68. 24. Behold he comes. This may very well be applied to the prospect which the Old-Testament saints had of Christ's coming in the flesh. Abraham saw his day at a distance, and was glad. The nearer the time came, the clearer discoveries were made of it; and they that waited for the consolation of Israel with an eye of faith, saw him come, and triumphed in the sight. Behold, he comes; for they had heard him say, (Ps. 40. 7.) Lo, I come; to which their faith here affixes its seal. Behold, he comes, as he has promised. [1.] He comes cheerfully and with great alacrity; he comes leaping and skipping like a roe, and like a young hart, (v. 9.) as one pleased with his own undertaking, and that had his heart upon it, and his delights with the sons of men. When he came to be baptized with the baptism of blood, how was he straitened till it was accomplished! Luke, 12. 50. [2.] He comes, slighting and surmounting all the difficulties that lay in his way; he comes leaping over the mountains, skipping over the hills, so some read it, making nothing of the discouragements he was to break through; the curse of the law, the death of the cross, must be undergone, all the powers of darkness must be grappled with; but, before the resolutions of his love, these great mountains become plains. Whatever opposition is given at any time to the deliverance of God's church, Christ will break through it, will get over it. [3.] He comes speedily, like a roe, or a young hart; they thought the time long, (every day a year,) but really he hastened; as now, so then, surely he comes quickly; he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry. When he comes for the deliverance of his people, he flies upon a cloud, and never stays beyond his time, which is the best time. We may apply it to particular believers, who find, that, even when Christ has withdrawn sensible comforts, and seems to forsake, yet it is but for a small moment, and he will soon return, with everlasting loving-kindness.

2. She pleases herself with the glimpses she has of him, and the glances she has of his favour; He stands behind our wall, I know he is there, for sometimes he looks forth at the window, or looks in at it, and displays himself through the lattice. Such was the state of the Old-Testament church while it was in expectation of the coming of the Messiah; the ceremonial law is called a wall of partition, (Eph. 2. 14.) a rail; (2 Cor. 3. 13.) but Christ stood behind that wall, they had him near them, they had him with them, though they could not see him clearly; he that was the substance was not far off from the shadows, Col. 2. 17. They saw him looking through the windows of the ceremonial institutions, and smiling through those lattices; in their sacrifices and purifications Christ discovered himself to them, and gave them intimations and earnestness of his grace both to engage and to encourage their longings for his coming. Such is our present state in comparison with what it will be at Christ's second coming; we now see him through a glass darkly, the body is a wall between us and him, through the windows of which we now and then get a sight of him, but not face to face, as we hope to see him shortly. In the sacraments Christ is near us, but it is behind the wall of external signs, through those lattices he manifests himself to us; but we shall shortly see him as he is. Some understand this of the state of a believer when he is under a cloud; Christ is out of sight and yet not far off. See Job, 34. 14. and compare Job, 23. 8. . 10. She calls the wall that interposed between her and her Beloved, our wall, because it is sin, and nothing else, that separates between us and God, and that is a wall of our own erecting; (Isa. 59. 1.) behind that he stands, as waiting to be gracious, and ready to be reconciled, upon our repentance. Then he looks in at the window, observes the frame of our hearts and the working of our souls; he looks forth at the window, and shews himself in giving them some comfort, that they may continue hoping for his return.

3. She repeats the gracious invitation he had given her to come a walking with him, v. 10. . 13. She remembers what her Beloved said to her, for it had made a very pleasing and powerful impression upon her, and the word that quickens us we shall never forget. She relates it for the encouragement of others, telling them what he had said to her soul, and done for her soul, Ps. 66. 16.

(1.) He called her his love and his fair one; whatever she is to others, to him she is acceptable, and in his eyes she is amiable. Those that take Christ for their Beloved, he will own them as his; never was any love lost that was bestowed upon Christ. Christ, by expressing his love to believers, invites and encourages them to follow him.

(2.) He called her to rise and come away, (v. 10.) and again, (v. 13.) the repetition denotes backwardness in her; (we have need to be often called to come away with Jesus Christ, precept must be upon precept, and line upon line;) but it denotes earnestness in him; so much is his heart set upon the welfare of precious souls, that he importunes them most pressingly to that which is for their own good.

(3.) He gave for a reason the return of the spring, and the pleasantness of the weather; which is elegantly described in a great variety of expressions.

[1.] The winter is past, the dark, cold, and barren, winter: long winters and hard ones pass away at last, they do not endure always. And the spring would not be so pleasant as it is, if it did not succeed the winter, which is a foil to its beauty, Eccl. 7. 14. The face neither of the heavens, nor the earth, is always the same, but subject to continual vicissitudes, diurnal and annual. The winter is past, but not past away for ever, it will come again, and we must provide for it in summer, Prov. 6. 6, 8. We must weep in winter, and rejoice in summer, as though we wept and rejoiced not, for both are passing.

[2.] The rain is over and gone, the winter-rain, the cold stormy rain, it is over now, and the dew is as the dew of herbs. Even the rain that drowned the world was over and gone at last, (Gen. 8. 1. . 3.) and God promised to drown the world no more, which was a type and figure of the covenant of grace, Isa. 54. 9.

[3.] The flowers appear on the earth; all winter they are dead and buried in their roots, and there is no sign of them, but in the spring they revive, and shew themselves in a wonderful variety and verdure, and, like the dew that produces them, tarry not for man, Mic. 5. 7. They appear, but they will soon disappear again, and man is herein like the flower of the field, Job, 14. 2.

[4.] The time of the singing of birds is come. The little birds, which all the winter lie hid in their retirements, and scarcely live, when the spring returns, forget all the calamities of the winter, and to the best of their capacity chant forth the praises of their Creator. Doubtless, he who understands the birds that cry for want, (Ps. 147. 9.) takes notice of those that sing for joy, Ps. 104. 12. The singing of the birds may shame our silence in God's praises, who are better fed, (Matth. 6. 26.) and better taught, (Job, 35. 11.) and are of more value than many sparrows. They live without inordinate care, (Matth. 6. 26.) and therefore they sing, while we murmur.

[5.] The voice of the turtle is heard in our land, which is one of the season-birds, mentioned Jer. 8. 7. that observe the time of their coming, and the time of their singing, and so shame us who know not the judgment of the Lord, understand not the times, nor do that which is beautiful in its season, do not sing in singing time.

[6.] The fig-tree puts forth her green figs, by which we know that summer is nigh, (Matth. 24. 32.) when the green figs will be ripe figs, and fit for use, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell: the earth produces not only flowers, (v. 12.) but fruits; and the smell of the fruits which are profitable, is to be preferred far before that of the flowers, which are only for shew and pleasure. Serpents, they say, are driven away by the smell of vines; and who is the old serpent, and who the true vine, we know very well.

Now this description of the returning spring, as a reason for coming away with Christ, is applicable,

First, To the introducing of the gospel in the room of the Old-Testament dispensation, during which it had been winter-time with the church. Christ's gospel warms that which was cold, makes that fruitful which was before dead and barren; when it comes to any place, it puts a beauty and glory upon that place, (2 Cor. 3. 7, 8.) and gives ministers occasion for joy. Spring-time is pleasant time, and so is gospel-time. Aspice venturo letentur ut omnia seculo—Behold what joy the dawning age inspires! said Virgil, from the Sibyls, perhaps with more reference to the setting up of the Messiah's kingdom at that time than he himself thought of. See Ps. 96. 11. Arise then, and improve this spring-time; come away from the world and the flesh, come into fellowship with Christ, 1 Cor. 1. 9.

Secondly, To the delivering of the church from the power of persecuting enemies, and the restoring of liberty and peace to it, after a severe winter of suffering and restraint. When the storms of trouble are over and gone, when the voice of the turtle, the joyful sound of the gospel of Christ, is again heard, and ordinances are enjoyed with freedom, then arise, and come away to improve the happy juncture. Walk in the light of the Lord, sing in the ways of the Lord: when the churches had rest, then were they edified, Acts. 9. 31.

Thirdly, To the conversion of sinners from a state of nature to a state of grace; that blessed change is like the return of the spring, a universal change, and a very comfortable one; it is a new creation, it is being born again. The soul that was hard, and cold, and frozen, and unprofitable, like the earth in winter, becomes fruitful, like the earth in spring; and, by degrees, like it, brings its fruits to perfection. This blessed change is owing purely to the approaches and influences of the Sun of Righteousness, who calls to us from heaven to arise, and come away; come, gather in summer.

Fourthly, To the consolations of the saints after a state of inward dejection and despondency. A child of God, under doubts and fears, is like the earth in winter, its nights long, its days dark, good affections chilled, nothing done, nothing got, the hand sealed up. But comfort will return, the birds shall sing again, and the flowers appear; arise, therefore, poor drooping soul, and come away with thy beloved. Arise, and shake thyself from the dust, Isa. 52. 2. Arise, shine, for thy light is come, (Isa. 60. 1.) walk in that light, Isa. 2. 5.

Fifthly, To the resurrection of the body at the last day, and the glory to be revealed. The bones that lay in the grave, as the roots of plants in the ground during the winter, shall then flourish as an herb, Isa. 66. 14.—26. 19. That will be an eternal farewell to winter, and a joyful entrance upon an everlasting spring.

14. O my dove, that art in the clefts of the rock, in the secret places of the stairs, let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice; for sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is comely. 15. Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines: for our vines have tender grapes. 16. My beloved is mine, and I am his: He feedeth among the lilies. 17. Until the day break, and the shadows flee away: turn, my beloved, and be thou like a roe, or a young hart, upon the mountains of Bethel.

Here is, 1. The encouraging invitation which Christ gives to the church, and every believing soul, to come into communion with him, v. 14. (1.) His love is now his dove; David had called the church God's turtle-dove, (Ps. 74. 19.) and so she is here called; a dove for beauty, her wings covered with silver, (Ps. 68. 13.) for innocence and inoffensiveness; a gracious spirit is a dove-like spirit, harmless, loving quietness and cleanliness, and faithful to Christ, as the turtle to her mate. The Spirit descended like a dove on Christ, and so he does on all Christians, making them of a meek and quiet spirit. She is Christ's dove, for he owns her, and delights in her; she can find no rest but in him and his ark, and therefore to him, as her Noah, she returns. (2.) This dove is in the clefts of the rock, and in the secret places of the stairs. This speaks, either, [1.] Her praise; Christ is the Rock, to whom she flies for shelter, and in whom alone she can think herself safe, and find herself easy, as a dove in the hole of a rock, when struck at by the birds of prey, Jer. 48. 28. Moses was hid in a cleft of the rock, that he might behold something of God's glory, which otherwise he could not have borne the brightness of. She retires into the secret places of the stairs, where she may be alone, undisturbed, and may the better commune with her own heart. Good Christians will find time to be private. Christ often withdrew to a mountain himself alone, to pray. [2.] Her blame; she crept into the clefts of the rock, and the secret places, for fear and shame; any where to hide her head, being heartless and discouraged, and shunning even the sight of her Beloved, being conscious to herself of her own unfitness and unworthiness to come into his presence, and speak to him, she drew back, and was like a silly dove without heart, Hos. 7. 11. (3.) Christ graciously calls her out of her retirements; Come, let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice; she was mourning like a dove, (Isa. 38. 14.) bemoaning herself like the doves of the valleys, where they are near the clefts of the impending rocks, mourning for her iniquities, (Ezek. 7. 16.) and refusing to be comforted. But Christ calls her to lift up her face without spot, being purged from an evil conscience, (Job, 11. 15.—22. 26.) to come boldly to the throne of grace, having a great High Priest there, (Heb. 4. 16.) to tell what her petition is, and what her request; Let me hear thy voice, hear what thou hast to say; what would ye that I should do unto you? Speak freely, speak up, and fear not a slight or repulse. (4.) For her encouragement, he tells her the good thoughts he had of her, whatever she thought of herself; Sweet is thy voice; thy praying voice, though thou canst but chatter like a crane or a swallow, (Isa. 38. 14.) it is music in God's ears; he has assured us, that the prayer of the upright is his delight; he smelled a sweet savour from Noah's sacrifice, and the spiritual sacrifices are no less acceptable, 1 Pet. 2. 5. This does not so much commend our services, as God's gracious condescension in making the best of them, and the efficacy of the much incense which is offered with the prayers of saints, Rev. 8. 3. "That countenance of thine, which thou art ashamed of, is comely, though now mournful, much more will it be so when it becomes cheerful." Then the voice of prayer is sweet and acceptable to God, when the countenance, the conversation in which we shew ourselves before men, is holy, and so comely and agreeable to our profession; those that are sanctified have the best comeliness.

2. The charge which Christ gives to his servants, to oppose and suppress that which is a terror to his church, and drives her, like a poor frightened dove into the clefts of the rock, and which is an obstruction and prejudice to the interests of his kingdom in this world, and in the heart; (v. 15.) Take us the foxes, (take them for us, for it is good service both to Christ and the church,) the little foxes, that creep in insensibly; for, though they are little, they do great mischief, they spoil the vines, which they must by no means be suffered to do at any time, especially now when our vines have tender grapes that must be preserved, or the vintage will fail. Believers are as vines, weak, but useful, plants; their fruits are as tender grapes at first, which must have time to come to maturity. This charge, to take the foxes, is, (1.) A charge to particular believers to mortify their own corruptions, their sinful appetites and passions, which are as foxes, little foxes, that destroy their graces and comforts, quash good motions, crush good beginnings, and prevent their coming to perfection. Seize the little foxes, the first risings of sin, the little ones of Babylon, (Ps. 137. 9.) these sins that seem little, for they often prove very dangerous. Whatever we find a hinderance to us in that which is good, we must put away. (2.) A charge to all in their places to oppose and prevent the spreading of all such opinions and practices as tend to corrupt men's judgments, debauch their consciences, perplex their minds, and discourage their inclinations to virtue and piety; persecutors are foxes, (Luke, 13. 32.) false prophets are foxes, Ezek. 13. 4. Those that sow the tares of heresy or schism, and, like Diotrephes, trouble the peace of the church, and obstruct the progress of the gospel, they are the foxes, the little foxes, which must not be knocked on the head, (Christ came not to destroy men's lives,) but taken, that they may be tamed, or else restrained from doing mischief.

3. The believing profession which the church makes of her relation to Christ, and the satisfaction she takes in her interest in him, and communion with him, v. 16. He had called her to rise, and come away with him, to let him see her face, and hear her voice; now this is her answer to that call, in which, though at present in the dark, and at a distance, (1.) She comforts herself with the thoughts of the mutual interest and relation that were between her and her beloved; My beloved to me, and I to him, so the original reads it very emphatically; the conciseness of the language speaks the largeness of her affection; "What he is to me, and I to him, may better be conceived than expressed." Note, 1. It is the unspeakable privilege of all true believers, that Christ is their's; My beloved is mine; this denotes not only propriety, ("I have a title to him,") but possession and tenure, "I receive from his fulness;" believers are partakers of Christ, they have not only an interest in him, but the enjoyment of him, are taken not only into covenant, but into communion, with him. All the benefits of his glorious undertaking, as Mediator, are made over to them. He is that to them, which the world neither is, nor can be, all that which they need and desire, and which will make a complete happiness for them. All he is, is their's, and all he has, all he has done, and all he is doing; all he has promised in the gospel, all he has prepared in heaven, all is your's. 2. It is the undoubted character of all true believers, that they are Christ's, and then, and then only, he is their's: they have given their own selves to him, (2 Cor. 8. 5.) they receive his doctrine and obey his law, they bear his image, and espouse his interest; they belong to Christ. If we be his, his wholly, his only, his for ever, we may take the comfort of his being our's. (2.) She comforts herself with the thoughts of the communications of his grace to his people; He feeds among the lilies. When she wants the tokens of his favour to her in particular, she rejoices in the assurance of his presence with all believers in general, who are as lilies in his eye; he feeds among them, he takes as much pleasure in them, and their assemblies, as a man does in his table or in his garden, for he walks in the midst of the golden candlesticks, he delights to converse with them, and to do them good.

4. The church's hope and expectation of Christ's coming, and her prayer grounded thereupon.

(1.) She doubts not but that the day will break, and the shadows will flee away. The gospel-day will dawn, and the shadows of the ceremonial law will flee away; this was the comfort of the Old-Testament church, that after the long night of that dark dispensation, the day-spring from on high would at length visit them, to give light to them that sit in darkness; when the sun rises, the shades of the night vanish, so do the shadows of the day when the substance comes. The day of comfort will come after a night of desertion. Or it may refer to the second coming of Christ, and the eternal happiness of the saints; the shadows of our present state will flee away, our darkness and doubts, our griefs and all our grievances, and a glorious day shall dawn, a morning when the upright shall have dominion, a day that shall have no night after it.

(2.) She begs the presence of her beloved, in the mean time, to support and comfort her; "Turn, my beloved, turn to me, come and visit me, come and relieve me, be with me always to the end of the age. In the day of my extremity, make haste to help me, make no long tarrying. Come over even the mountains of division, interposing time and days, with some gracious anticipations of that light and love."

(3.) She begs that he would not only turn to her for the present, but hasten his coming to fetch her to himself; "Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Though there be mountains in the way, thou canst, like a roe, or a young hart, step over them with ease, Oh shew thyself to me, or take me up to thee."

CHAP. III.

In this chapter, 1. The church gives an account of a sore trial wherewith she was exercised through the withdrawing of her beloved from her, the pains she was at before she recovered the comfortable sense of his favour again, and the resolution she took, when she did recover it, not to lose it again, as she had done through her own carelessness, v. 1. 5. 11. The daughters of Jerusalem admire the excellencies of the church, v. 6. 11. The church admires Jesus Christ under the person of Solomon, his bed, and the life-guards about it, (v. 7, 8.) his chariot, v. 9, 10. She calls upon the daughters of Zion, who were admiring her, to admire him rather, especially as he appeared on his coronation day, and the day of his nuptials, v. 11.

1. BY night on my bed I sought him whom my soul loveth: I sought him, but I found him not. 2. I will rise now, and go about the city in the streets, and in the broad ways I will seek him whom my soul loveth: I sought him, but I found him not. 3. The watchmen that go about the city found me: to whom I said, Saw ye him whom my soul loveth? 4. It was but a little that I passed from them, but I found him whom my soul loveth: I held him, and would not let him go, until I had brought him into my mother's house, and into the chamber of her that conceived me. 5. I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes, and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please.

God was not wont to say to the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me, in vain; and yet here we have the spouse for a great while seeking her beloved in vain, but finding him at last, to her unspeakable satisfaction. It was hard to the Old-Testament church to find Christ in the ceremonial law, and the types and figures which then were of good things to come; long was the consolation of Israel looked for before it came; the watchman of that church gave little assistance to those who inquired after him; but at length Simeon had him in his arms, whom his soul loved. It is applicable to the case of particular believers, who often walk in darkness a great while, but at even time it shall be light, and they that seek Christ to the end shall find him at length. Observe,

1. How the spouse sought him in vain upon her bed, (v. 1.) when she was up and looking about her, grace in act and exercise, though her beloved was withdrawn, yet she could not see him at a distance, (ch. 2. 8.) but now it was otherwise. She still continued her affection to him, still it was he whom her soul loved, that bond of the covenant still continued firm; "Though he slay me, I will trust in him; though he leave me, I will love him. When I have him not in my arms, I have him in my heart." But she wanted the communion she used to have with him; as David, when he thirsted for God, for the living God. She sought him, but, (1.) it was by night on her bed, it was late and lazy seeking. Her understanding was clouded, it was by night, in the dark; her affections were chilled, it was on her bed half asleep. The wise virgins slumbered in the absence of the Bridegroom. It was a dark time with the believer; she saw not her signs, and yet she sought them. They whose souls love Jesus Christ will continue to seek him, even in silence and solitude: their reins instruct them to do so, even in the night season. (2.) She failed in her endeavour. Sometimes he is found of them that seek him not, (Isa. 65. 1.) but here he is not found of one that sought him; either for the punishment of her corruptions, her slothfulness and security, (we miss of comfort, because we do not seek it aright,) or for the exercise of graces, her faith and patience, to try whether she will continue seeking; the woman of Canaan sought Christ, and found him not at first, that she might find him, at length, so much the more to her honour and comfort.

2. How she sought him in vain abroad, v. 2. She had made trial of secret worship, and had gone through the duties of the closet, had remembered him on her bed, and meditated on him in the night-watches, (Ps. 63. 6.) but she did not meet with comfort; My sore ran in the night, and then I remembered God, and was troubled; (Ps. 77. 2, 3.) and yet she is not driven off by the disappointment from the use of further means; she resolves, "I will rise now, I will not lie here if I cannot find my Beloved here, nor be content if he be withdrawn. I will rise now without delay, and seek him immediately, lest he withdraw further from me." Those that would seek Christ so as to find him, must lose no time. I will rise out of a warm bed, and go out, in a cold dark night, in quest of my Beloved. Those that seek Christ must not startle at difficulties. I will rise, and go about the city, the holy city, in the streets, and the broad-ways; for she knew he was not to be found in any blind by-ways; we must seek in the city, in Jerusalem, which was a type of the gospel-church. The likeliest place to find Christ is in the temple, (Luke, 2. 46.) in the streets of the gospel-church, in holy ordinances, where the children of Zion pass and repass at all hours. She had a good purpose, when she said, I will arise now, but the good performance was all in all; she arose, and sought him. Those that are in pursuit of Christ, the knowledge of him, and communion with him, must turn every stone, seek every where; and yet she found him not; she was still unsatisfied, uneasy, as Job, when he looked on all sides, but could not perceive any tokens of the divine favour, (Job, 24. 8, 9.) and the Psalmist often, when he complained that God hid his face from him, Ps. 88. 14. We may be in the way of our duty, and yet may miss of comfort, for the wind bloweth where it listeth. How heavy is the accent on this repeated complaint, I sought him, but I found him not! Like that of Mary Magdalen, They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him, John, 20. 13.

3. How she inquired of the watchmen concerning him, v. 3. In the night the watchmen go about the city, for the preservation of its peace and safety, to guide and assist the honest and quiet, as well as to be a check upon those that are disorderly; these met her in her walks, and she asked them if they could give her any tidings of her Beloved. In the streets and broad ways of Jerusalem, she might meet with enough to divert her from her pursuit, and to entertain her, though she could not meet her Beloved; but she regards none in comparison with him. Gracious souls press through crowds of other delights and contentments, in pursuit of Christ, whom they prefer before their chief joy. Mary Magdalen sees angels in the sepulchre, but that will not do, unless she see Jesus. Saw ye him whom my soul loveth? Note, We must evidence the sincerity of our love to Christ by our solicitous inquiries after him. The children of the bride-chamber will mourn, when the bridegroom is taken away, (Matth. 9. 15.) especially for the sin which provoked him to withdraw; and if we do so, we shall be in care to recover the sense of his favour, and diligent and constant in the use of proper means; in order thereunto, we must search the scriptures, be much in prayer, keep close to ordinances, and all with this upon our heart, Saw ye him whom my soul loveth? Those only who have seen Christ themselves are likely to direct others to a sight of him. When the Greeks came to worship at the feast, they applied themselves to Philip, with such an address as this of the spouse to the watchmen, Sir, we would see Jesus, John, 12. 21.

4. How she found him at last, v. 4. She passed from the watchmen as soon as she perceived they could give her no tidings of her Beloved; she would not stay with them, because he was not among them, but went on seeking; for (as Ainsworth observes) the society neither of brethren, nor of the church, nor of ministers, can comfort the afflicted conscience, unless Christ himself be apprehended by faith. But soon after she parted from the watchmen she found him whom she sought, and then called him, him whom my soul loveth, with as much delight as before with desire. Note, Those that continue seeking Christ shall find him at last, and when perhaps they are almost ready to despair of finding him. See Ps. 42. 7, 8.—77. 9, 10. Isa. 54. 7, 8. Disappointments must not drive us away from gracious pursuits; hold out, faith and patience, the vision is for an appointed time, and though the watchman can give us no account of it, at the end it shall itself speak, and not lie; and the comfort that comes in after long waiting, in the use of means, will be so much the sweeter at last.

5. How close she kept to him, when she had found him; she is, now, as much in fear of losing him, as, before, she was in care to find him; I held him, held him fast, as the women, when they met with Christ after his resurrection, held him by the feet, and worshipped him, Matth. 28. 9. "I would not let him go. Not only, I would never do any thing to provoke him to depart, but I would by faith and prayer prevail with him to stay, and by the exercise of grace preserve inward peace." Those that know how hard comfort is come by, and how dear it is bought, will be afraid of forfeiting it, and playing it away, and will think nothing too much to do to keep it safe. Non minor est virtus quam querere parta tueri—As much is implied in securing our acquisitions as in making them. They that have laid hold on wisdom must retain her, Prov. 3. 18. Those that hold Christ fast, in the arms of faith and love, shall not let him go, he will abide with them.

6. How desirous she was to make others acquainted with him; "I brought him to my mother's house, that all my relations, all who are dear to me, might have the benefit of communion with him." When Zaccheus found Christ, or rather was found of him, salvation came to his house, Luke, 19. 9. Wherever we find Christ, we must take him home with us to our houses, especially to our hearts. The church is our mother, and we should be concerned for her interests, that she may have Christ present with her, and be earnest in prayer for his presence with his people and ministers always. They that enjoy the tokens of Christ's favour to their own souls, should desire that the church, and all religious assemblies in their public capacity, might likewise enjoy the tokens of his favour.

7. What care she was in that no disturbance might be given him; (v. 5.) she repeats the charge she had before given (ch. 2. 7.) to the daughters of Jerusalem, not to stir up, or awake, her Love. When she had brought him into her mother's house, among her sisters, she gives them a strict charge to keep all quiet, and in good order, to be very observant of him, careful to please him, and afraid of offending him. The charge given to the church in the wilderness concerning the angel of the covenant, who was among them, explains this; (Exod. 23. 21.) Beware of him, and obey his voice, provoke him not. See that none of you stir out of your places, lest you disturb him, but with quietness work, and mind your own business; make no noise, let all clamour and bitterness be put far from you, for that grieves the Holy Spirit of God, Eph. 4. 30, 31. Some make this to be Christ's charge to the daughters of Jerusalem, not to disturb or disquiet his church, nor trouble the minds of the disciples; for Christ is very tender of the peace of his church, and all the members of it, even the little ones; and those that trouble them shall bear their judgment, Gal. 5. 10.

6. Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense, with all powders of the merchant?

These are the words of the daughters of Jerusalem, to whom the charge was given, v. 5. They had looked shily upon the bride, because she was black; (ch. 1. 6.) but now they admire her, and speak of her with great respect; Who is this? How beautiful she looks! Who would have expected such a comely and magnificent person to come out of the wilderness? As when Christ rode in triumph into Jerusalem, they said, Who is this? And of the accession of strangers to the church, she herself says, with wonder, (Isa. 49. 21.) Who has begotten me these?

1. This is applicable to the Jewish church, when, after forty years' wandering in the wilderness, they came out of it, to take a glorious possession of the land of promise; and this may very well be illustrated by what Balaam said of them at that time, when they ascended out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, and he stood admiring them, From the top of the rocks I see him. How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob! Numb. 23. 9.—24. 5.

2. It is applicable to any public deliverance of the church of God, as particularly out of Babylon, the Old-Testament and the New-Testament Babylon; then the church is like pillars of smoke, ascending upward in devout affections, the incense of praise, from which, as from Noah's sacrifice, God smells a sweet savour; then she is amiable in the eyes of her friends, and her enemies too cannot but have a veneration for her, and worship at her feet, knowing that God has loved her, Rev. 3. 9. Sometimes the fear of the Jews was upon their neighbours, when they saw that God was with them of a truth, Esth. 3. 17.

3. It is applicable to the recovery of a gracious soul out of a state of desertion and despondency. (1.) She ascends out of the wilderness, the dry and barren land, where there is no way, where there is no water, where travellers are still in want, and ever at a loss; here a poor soul may long be left to wander, but shall come up, at last, under the conduct of the Comforter. (2.) She comes up like pillars of smoke, like a cloud of incense ascending from the altar, or the smoke of the burnt-offerings. This intimates a fire of pious and devout affections in the soul, whence this smoke arises, and the mounting of the soul heaven-ward in this smoke, (as Judges, 13. 20.) the heart lifted up to God in the heavens, as the sparks fly upward. Christ's return to the soul gives life to its devotion, and its communion with God is most reviving, when it ascends out of a wilderness. (3.) She is perfumed with myrrh and frankincense; she is replenished with the graces of God's Spirit, which are as sweet spices, or as the holy incense, which, being now kindled by his gracious returns, sends forth a very fragrant smell; her devotions be now peculiarly lively, she is not only acceptable to God, but amiable in the eyes of others also, who are ready to cry out with admiration, Who is this? What a monument of mercy is this! The graces and comforts with which she is perfumed, are called the powers of the merchant, for they are far-fetched, and dear-bought, by our Lord Jesus, that blessed Merchant, who took a long voyage, and was at vast expence, no less than that of his own blood, to purchase them for us. They are not the products of our own soil, nor the growth of our own country; no, they are imported from the heavenly Canaan, the better country.

7. Behold his bed, which is Solomon's three-score valiant men are about it, of the valiant of Israel. 8. They all hold swords, being expert in war: every man hath his sword upon his thigh, because of fear in the night. 9. King Solomon made himself a chariot of the wood of Lebanon. 10. He made the pillars thereof of silver, the bottom thereof of gold, the covering of it of purple; the midst thereof being paved with love, for the daughters of Jerusalem. 11. Go forth, O ye daughters of Zion, and behold King Solomon with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals, and in the day of the gladness of his heart.

The daughters of Jerusalem stood admiring the spouse, and commending her, but she overlooks their praises, is not puffed up with them, but transfers all the glory to Christ, and directs them to look off her to him, recommends him to their esteem, and sets herself to applaud him. Here he is three times called Solomon, and we have that name but three times besides in all this song, ch. 1. 5.—8. 11, 12. It is Christ that is here meant, who is greater than Solomon, and of whom Solomon was an illustrious type for his wisdom and wealth, and especially his building of the temple.

Three things she admires him for;

1. The safety of his bed; (v. 7.) Behold his bed, even Solomon's, very rich and fine; for such the curtains of Solomon were. His bed, which is above Solomon's, so some read it. Christ's bed, though he had not where to lay his head, is better than Solomon's best bed; the church is his bed, for he has said of it, This is my rest for ever, here will I dwell. The hearts of believers are his bed, for he lies all night between their breasts, Eph. 3. 17. Heaven is his bed, the rest into which he entered, when he had done his work. Or, it may be meant of the sweet repose and satisfaction which gracious souls enjoy in communion with him; it is called his bed, because, though we are admitted to it, and therefore it is called our bed, (ch. 1. 16.) yet it is his peace that is our rest, John, 14. 27. I will give you rest, Matth. 11. 28. It is Solomon's bed, whose name signifies peace, because in his days Judah and Israel dwelt safely under their vines and fig-trees.

That which she admires his bed for, is, the guard that surrounded it; they that rest in Christ not only dwell at ease, (many do so who yet are in the greatest danger,) but they dwell in safety; their holy serenity is under the protection of a holy security; this bed had threescore valiant men about it, as yeomen of the guard, or the band of gentlemen-pensioners, they are of the valiant of Israel, and a great many bold and brave men David's reign had produced; the life guard-men are well-armed, they all hold swords, and know how to hold them, they are expert in war, well-skilled in all the arts of it; they are posted about the bed at a convenient distance; they are in a posture of defence, every man with his sword upon his thigh, and his hand upon his sword, ready to draw upon the first alarm, and this, because of fear in the night, because of the danger feared; for the lives of princes, even the wisest and best, as they are more precious, so they are more exposed, and require to be more guarded, than the lives of common persons. Or, because of the fear of it, and the apprehension which the spouse may have of danger, these guards are set for her satisfaction, that she may be quiet from the fear of evil, which believers themselves are subject to, especially in the night, when they are under a cloud as to their spiritual state, or in any outward trouble more than ordinary. Christ himself was under the special protection of his Father in his whole undertaking; In the shadow of his hand has he hid me; (Isa. 49. 2.) he had legions of angels at his command. The church is well-guarded, more are with her than are against her; lest any hurt this vineyard, God himself keeps it night and day; (Isa. 27. 2, 3.) particular believers, when they repose themselves in Christ, and with him, though it may be night-time with them, and they may have their fears in the night, are yet safe, as safe as Solomon himself in the midst of his guards; the angels have a charge concerning them, ministers are appointed to watch for their souls, and they ought to be valiant men, expert in the spiritual warfare, holding the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, and having that girt upon their thigh, always ready to them for the silencing of the fears of God's people in the night. All the attributes of God are engaged for the safety of believers; they are kept as in a strong hold by his power, (1 Pet. 1. 5.) are safe in his name, (Prov. 18. 10.) his peace protects those in whom it rules, (Phil. 4. 7.) and the effect of righteousness in them is quietness and assurance, Isa. 32. 17. Our danger is from the rulers of the darkness of this world, but we are safe in the armour of light.

II. The splendour of his chariot, v. 9, 10. As Christ and believers rest in safety under a sufficient guard, so when they appear publicly, as kings in their coaches of state, they appear in great magnificence. This chariot was of Solomon's own contriving and making, the materials very rich, silver, and gold, and cedar, and purple: he made it for himself, and yet made it for the daughters of Jerusalem, to oblige them. Some by this chariot, or coach, or chaise, (the word is no where else used in scripture,) understand the human nature of Christ, in which the divine nature rode as in a chariot; it was a divine workmanship; A body hast thou prepared me; the structure was very fine, but that which was at the bottom of it, was love, pure love to the children of men. Others make it to represent the everlasting gospel, in which, as in an open chariot, Christ shews himself, and, as in a chariot of war, ride forth triumphantly, conquering, and to conquer. The pillars, the seven pillars, (Prov. 9. 1.) are of silver, for the words of the Lord are as silver tried, (Ps. 12. 6.) nay, they are better than thousands of gold and silver; it is hung with purple, a princely colour, all the adornings of it are dyed in the precious blood of Christ, and that gives them this colour; but that which completes the glory of it, is love, it is pared with love, it is lined with love, not love of strangers, as Solomon's was in the days of his defection, but love of the daughters of Jerusalem, a holy love. Silver is better than cedar, gold than silver, but love is better than gold, better than all, and it is put last, for nothing can be better than that. The gospel is all love.

Mr. Durham applies it to the covenant of redemption, the way of our salvation, as it is contrived in the eternal counsel of God, and manifested to us in the scripture. This is that work of Christ himself, wherein the glory of his grace and love to sinners most eminently appears, and which makes him amiable and admirable in the eyes of believers; in this covenant, love is conveyed to them, and they are carried in it to the perfection of love, and, as it were, ride in triumph. It is admirably framed and contrived, both for the glory of Christ, and for the comfort of believers; it is well-ordered in all things, and sure; (2 Sam. 23. 5.) it has pillars that cannot be shaken: it is made of the wood of Lebanon, which can never rot; the basis of it is gold, the most lasting metal; the blood of the covenant, that rich purple, is the cover of this chariot, by which believers are sheltered from the wind and storms of divine wrath, and the troubles of this world; but the midst of it, and that which is all in all in it, is love, that love of Christ which passes knowledge, and the dimensions of which are immeasurable.

III. The lustre of his royal person, when he appears in his greatest pomp, v. 11. Here observe,

1. The call that is given to the daughters of Zion, to acquaint themselves with the glories of king Solomon; Go forth, and behold him. The multitude of the spectators adds to the beauty of a splendid cavalcade; Christ, in his gospel, manifests himself; let each of us add to the number of those that give honour to him, by giving themselves the satisfaction of looking upon him. Who should pay respects to Zion's King, but Zion's daughters? They have reason to rejoice greatly when he comes, Zech. 9. 9. (1.) Behold him then; look with pleasure upon Christ in his glory; look upon him with an eye of faith, with a fixed eye: here is a sight worth seeing; behold, and admire him, behold, and love him; look upon him, and know him again. (2.) Go forth, and behold him, go off from the world, as those that see no beauty and excellency in it, in comparison with what is to be seen in the Lord Jesus. Go out of yourselves, and let the sight of his transcendent beauty put you out of conceit with yourselves. Go forth to the place where he is to be seen, to the street through which he passes, as Zaccheus.

2. The direction that is given them to take special notice of that which they would not see every day, and that was, his crown, either the crown of gold adorned with jewels, which he wore on his coronation-day; (Solomon's mother, Bathsheba, though she did not procure that for him, yet, by her seasonable interposal, she helped to secure it to him when Adonijah was catching at it;) or the garland, or crown of flowers and green tied with ribands, which his mother made for him, to adorn the solemnity of his nuptials. Perhaps Solomon's coronation-day was his marriage-day, the day of his espousals, when the garland his mother crowned him with was added to the crown his people crowned him with. Applying this to Christ, it speaks, (1.) The many honours put upon him, and the power and dominion he is intrusted with; Go forth, and see king Jesus, with the crown wherewith his Father crowned him, when he declared him his beloved Son, in whom he was well-pleased; when he set him as king upon his holy hill of Zion; when he advanced him to his own right hand, and invested him with a sovereign authority, both in heaven and in earth, and put all things under his feet. (2.) The dishonour put upon him by his persecutors. Some apply it to the crown of thorns, with which his mother, the Jewish church, crowned him on the day of his death, which was the day of his espousals to his church, when he loved it, and gave himself for it; (Eph. 5. 25.) and it is observable, that when he was brought forth wearing the crown of thorns, Pilate said, and said it to the daughters of Zion, Behold the man. (3.) It seems especially to mean the honour done him by his church, as his mother, and by all true believers, in whose hearts he is formed, and of whom he has said, These are my mother, and sister, and brother, Matth. 12. 50. They give him the glory of his undertaking; to him is glory in the church, Eph. 3. 21. When believers accept of him as their's, and join themselves to him in an everlasting covenant, [1.] It is his coronation-day in their souls; before conversion they were crowning themselves, but then they begin to crown Christ, and continue to do so from that day forward; they appoint him their Head, they bring every thought into obedience to him; they set up his throne in their hearts, and cast all their crowns at his feet. [2.] It is the day of his espousals, in which he betrothes them to him for ever in loving-kindness and in mercies, joins them to himself in faith and love, and gives himself to them in the promises and all he has, to be their's. Thou shalt not be for another, so will I also be for thee; (Hos. 3. 3.) and to him they are presented as chaste virgins. [3.] It is the day of the gladness of his heart; he is pleased with the honour that his people do him, pleased with the progress of his interest among them. Does Satan fall before them? In that hour Jesus rejoices in spirit, Luke, 10. 18, 21. There is joy in heaven over repenting sinners; the family is glad when the prodigal son returns. Go forth, and behold Christ's grace towards sinners, as his crown, his brightest glory.

CHAP. IV.

In this chapter, I. Jesus Christ, having espoused his church to himself, (ch. 3. 11.) highly commends her beauty in the several expressions of it, concluding her fair, all fair, (v. 1. .5.) and again, v. 7. II. He retires himself, and invites her with him, from the mountains of terror to those of delight, v. 6. 8. III. He professes his love to her, and his delight in her affection to him, v. 9. .14. IV. She ascribes all she had, that was valuable in her, to him, and depends upon the continued influence of his grace, to make her more and more acceptable to him, v. 15, 16.

1. BEHOLD, thou art fair, my love; behold, thou art fair; thou hast doves' eyes within thy locks: thy hair is as a flock of goats, that appear from mount Gilead. 2. Thy teeth are like a flock of sheep that are even shorn, which came up from the washing; whereof every one bear twins, and none is barren among them. 3. Thy lips are like a thread of scarlet, and thy speech is comely: thy temples are like a piece of a pomegranate within thy locks. 4. Thy neck is like the tower of David builded for an armoury, whereon there hang a thousand bucklers, all shields of mighty men. 5. Thy two breasts are like two young roes that are twins, which feed among the lilies. 6. Until the day break, and the shadows flee away, I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, and to the hill of frankincense. 7. Thou art all fair, my love; there is no spot in thee.

Here is,

I. A large and particular account of the beauties of the church, and of gracious souls on whom the image of God is renewed, consisting in the beauty of holiness. In general, he that is a competent judge of beauty, whose judgment, we are sure, is according to truth, and what all must subscribe to, he has said, Behold, thou art fair. She had commended him, and called all about her to take notice of his glories; hereby she recommends herself to him, gains his favour, and, in return for her respects, he calls to all about him to take notice of her graces. Those that honour Christ, he will honour, 1 Sam. 2. 30. He does not flatter her, nor design hereby either to make her proud of herself, or to court her praises of him; but, 1. It is to encourage her under her present dejections; whatever others thought of her, she was amiable in his eyes. 2. It is to teach her what to value herself upon, not any external advantages, (which would add nothing to her, and the want of which would deprive her of nothing that was really excellent,) but upon the comeliness of grace which he had put upon her. 3. It is to invite others to think well of her too, and to join themselves to her; Thou art my love, thou lovest me, and art loved of me, and therefore thou art fair; all the beauty of the saints is derived from him, and they shine by reflecting his light; it is the beauty of the Lord our God that is upon us, Ps. 90. 17. She was espoused to him, and that made her beautiful. Uxor fulget radiis mariti—The spouse shines in her husband's rays. It is repeated; Thou art fair, and again, Thou art fair; noting not only the certainty of it, but the pleasure he took in speaking of it.

As to the representation here made of the beauty of the church, the images are certainly very bright, the shades strong, and the comparisons bold; not proper indeed to represent any external beauty, for they were not designed to do so, but the beauty of holiness, the new man, the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible. Seven particulars are specified, a number of perfection, for the church is enriched with manifold graces by the seven spirits that are before the throne, Rev. 1. 4. 1 Cor. 1. 5, 7.

(1.) Her eyes; a good eye contributes much to a beauty; Thou hast doves' eyes, clear and chaste, and often cast up toward heaven. It is not the eagle's eye, that can face the sun, but the dove's eye, a humble, modest, mournful, eye, that is the praise of those whom Christ loves. Ministers are the church's eyes; (Isa. 52. 8.) Thy watchmen shall see eye to eye; they must be like doves' eyes; harmless and inoffensive, (Matth. 10. 16.) having their conversation in the world, in simplicity and godly sincerity. Wisdom and knowledge are the eyes of the new man; they must be clear, but not haughty, not exercised in things too high for us. When our aims and intentions are sincere and honest, then we have doves' eyes; when we look not unto idols, (Ezek. 18. 6.) but have our eyes ever toward the Lord, Ps. 25. 15. The doves' eyes are within the locks, which are as a shade upon them, so that, [1.] They cannot fully see; as long as we are here in this world, we know but in part; a hair hangs in our eyes, we cannot order our speech by reason of darkness; death will shortly cut those locks, and then we shall see all things clearly. [2.] They cannot be fully seen, but as the stars through the thin clouds. Some make it to intimate the bashfulness of her looks; she suffers not her eyes to wander, but limits them with her locks.

(2.) Her hair; it is compared to a flock of goats, which looked white, and were, on the top of the mountains, like a fine head of hair: and the sight was the more pleasant to the spectator, because the goats have not only gravity from their beards, but they are comely in going; (Prov. 30. 29.) but it was most pleasant of all to the owner, much of whose riches consisted in his flocks. Christ puts a value upon that in the church, and in believers, which others make no more account of than of their hair; he told his disciples that the very hairs of their head were all numbered, as carefully as men number their flocks, (Matth. 10. 30.) and that not a hair of their head should perish, Luke, 21. 18. Some by the hair here understand the outward conversation of a believer, which ought to be comely, and decent, and agreeable to the holiness of the heart. The apostle opposes good works, such as become the professors of godliness, to the plaiting of the hair, 1 Tim. 2. 9, 10. Mary Magdalen's hair was beautiful when she wiped the feet of Christ with it.

(3.) Her teeth, r. 2. Ministers are the church's teeth; like nurses, they chew the meat for the babes of Christ. The Chaldee paraphrase applies it to the priests and Levites, who fed upon the sacrifices as the representatives of the people. Faith, by which we feed upon Christ, meditation, by which we ruminate on the word, and chew the cud upon what we have heard, in order to the digesting of it, are the teeth of the new man. These are here compared to a flock of sheep; Christ called his disciples and ministers a little flock. It is the praise of teeth to be even, to be white, and kept clean, like sheep from the washing, and to be firm and well-fixed in the gums, and not like sheep that cast their young; for so the word signifies, which we translate barren. It is the praise of ministers to be even in mutual love and concord, to be pure and clean from all moral pollutions, and to be fruitful, bringing forth souls to Christ, and nursing his lambs.

(4.) Her lips; these are compared to a thread of scarlet; (v. 3.) red lips are comely, and a sign of health, as the paleness of the lips is a sign of faintness and weakness; her lips were of the colour of scarlet, but thin lips, like a thread of scarlet; the next words explain it; Thy speech is comely, always with grace, good, and to the use of edifying, which adds much to the beauty of a Christian. When we praise God with our lips, and with the mouth make confession of him to salvation, then they are as a thread of scarlet. All our good works and good words must be washed in the blood of Christ, dyed like the scarlet thread, and then, and not till then, they are acceptable to God. The Chaldee applies it to the chief priest, and his prayers for Israel on the day of atonement.

(5.) Her temples, or cheeks, which are here compared to a piece of a pomegranate, fruits which, when cut in two, have red veins, or specks, in them, like a blush in the face. Humility and modesty, blushing to lift up our faces before God, blushing at the remembrance of sin, and in a sense of our unworthiness of the honour put upon us, will beautify us very much in the eyes of Christ. The blushes of Christ's bride are within her locks, which intimates (says Mr. Durham) that she blushes when no other sees, and for that which none sees but God and conscience; also that she seeks not to proclaim her humility, but modestly covers that too; yet the evidences of all these, in a tender walk, appear, and are, comely.

(6.) Her neck; this is here compared to the tower of David; (v. 4.) this is generally applied to the grace of faith, by which we are united to Christ, as the body is united to the head by the neck; this is like the tower of David, furnishing us with weapons of war, especially bucklers and shields, as the soldiers were supplied with them out of that tower; for faith is our shield, (Eph. 6. 16.) they that have it never want a buckler, for God will compass them with his favour as with a shield. When this neck is like a tower, straight, and stately, and strong, a Christian goes on in his way, and works with courage and magnanimity, and does not hang a drooping head, as he does when faith fails. Some make the shields of the mighty men, that are here said to hang up in the tower of David, to be the monuments of the valour of David's worthies; their shields were preserved, to keep in remembrance them and their heroic acts, intimating, that it is a great encouragement to the saints to hold up their heads, to see what great things the saints in all ages have accomplished and won by faith. In Heb. 11. we have the shields of the mighty men hung up, the exploits of believers, and the trophies of their victories.

(7.) Her breasts; these are like two young roes that are twins, v. 5. The church's breasts are both for ornament, (Ezek. 16. 7.) and for use, they are the breasts of her consolation, (Isa. 66. 11.) as she is said to suck the breasts of kings, Isa. 60. 16. Some apply these to the two Testaments; others to the two sacraments, the seals of the covenant of grace; others to the ministers, who are to be spiritual nurses to the children of God, and to give out to them the sincere milk of the word, that they may grow thereby; and, in order to that, are themselves to feed among the lilies where Christ feeds, (ch. 2. 16.) that they may be to the babes of the church as full breasts. Or, the breasts of a believer are his love to Christ, which he is pleased with, as a tender husband is with the affections of his wife, who is therefore said to be to him as the loving hind, and the pleasant roe, because her breasts satisfy him at all times, Prov. 5. 19. This includes also his edifying others, and communicating grace to them, which adds much to a Christian's beauty.

II. The Bridegroom's resolution hereupon to retire to the mountain of myrrh, (v. 6.) and there to make his residence. This mountain of myrrh is supposed to signify the mount Moriah, on which the temple was built, where incense was daily burnt to the honour of God; Christ was so pleased with the beauty of his church, that he chose this to be his rest for ever, here he will dwell till the day break and the shadows flee away. Christ's parting promise to his disciples, as the representatives of the church, answers to this; Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world. Where the ordinances of God are duly administered, there Christ will be, and there we must meet him at the door of the tabernacle of the meeting. Some make these to be the words of the spouse, either modestly ashamed of the praises given her, and willing to get out of the hearing of them, or desirous to be constant to the holy hill, not doubting but there to find suitable and sufficient succour and relief in all her straits, and there to cast anchor, and wish for the day which, at the time appointed, would break, and the shadows flee away. The holy hill (as some observe) is here called both a mountain of myrrh, which is bitter, and a hill of frankincense, which is sweet, for there we have occasion both to mourn and rejoice; repentance is a bitter sweet, but in heaven it will be all frankincense, and no myrrh. Prayer is compared to incense, and Christ will meet his praying people, and will bless them.

III. His repeated commendation of the beauty of his spouse; (v. 7.) Thou art all fair, my love. He had said, (v. 1.) Thou art fair; but here he goes further, and, in review of the particulars, as of those of the creation, he pronounces all very good: "Thou art all fair, my love, thou art all over beautiful, and there is nothing amiss in thee, and thou hast all beauties in thee; thou art sanctified wholly in every part, all things are become new, (2 Cor. 5. 17.) there is not only a new face and a new name, but a new man, a new nature; there is no spot in thee, as far as thou art renewed." The spiritual sacrifices must be without blemish; there is no spot but such as is often the spot of God's children, none of the leopard's spots. The church, when Christ shall present it to himself a glorious church will be altogether without spot or wrinkle, Eph. 5. 27.

8. Come with me from Lebanon, my spouse, with me from Lebanon: look from the top of Amana, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the lions' dens, from the mountains of the leopards. 9. Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse; thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes, with one chain of thy neck. 10. How fair is thy love, my sister, my spouse! How much better is thy love than wine! and the smell of thine ointments than all spices! 11. Thy lips, O my spouse, drop as the honey-comb: honey and milk are under thy tongue; and the smell of thy garments is like the smell of Lebanon. 12. A garden inclosed is my sister, my spouse; a spring shut up, a fountain sealed. 13. Thy plants are an orchard of pomegranates, with pleasant fruits, camphire, with spikenard. 14. Spikenard and saffron, calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense, myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices.

These are still the words of Christ to his church, expressing his great esteem of her and affection to her, the opinion he had of her beauty and excellency, the desire he had of, and the delight he had in, her converse and society. And so ought men to love their wives as Christ loves the church, and takes pleasure in it as if it were spotless and had no fault, when yet it is compassed with infirmity.

Now, observe here,

I. The endearing names and titles by which he calls her, to express his love to her, to assure her of it, and to engage and excite her love to him. Twice here he calls her My spouse, (v. 8, 11.) and three times My sister, my spouse, v. 9, 10, 12. Mention was made (ch. 3. 11.) of the day of his espousals, and, after that, she is called his spouse, not before. Note, There is a marriage-covenant between Christ and his church, between Christ and every true believer. Christ calls his church his spouse, and his calling her so makes her so. "I have betrothed thee unto me for ever; and as the bridegroom rejoices over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee." He is not ashamed to own the relation, but, as becomes a kind and tender husband, he speaks affectionately to her, and calls her his spouse, which cannot but strongly engage her to be faithful to him. Nay, because no one relation among men is sufficient to set forth Christ's love to his church, and, to shew that all this must be understood spiritually, he owns her in two relations, which, among men, are incompatible, My sister, my spouse. Abraham's saying of Sarah, She is my sister, was interpreted as a denying of her to be his wife; but Christ's church is to him both a sister and a spouse, as Matth. 12. 50. a sister and mother. His calling her sister, is grounded upon his taking our nature upon him in his incarnation, and his making us partakers of his nature in our sanctification. He clothed himself with a body, (Heb. 2. 14.) and he clothes believers with his Spirit, (1 Cor. 6. 17.) and so they become his sisters. They are children of God his Father, (2 Cor. 6. 18.) and so they become his sisters; he that sanctifies, and they that are sanctified, are all of one, (Heb. 2. 11.) and he owns them, and loves them, as his sisters.

II. The gracious call he gives her to come along with him as a faithful bride, that must forget her own people and her father's house, and leave all to cleave to him. Ubi tu Caius, ibi ego Caia—Where thou Caius art, I Caia will be. Come with me from Lebanon, v. 8.

It is, 1. A precept; so we take it, like that, (ch. 2. 10, 13.) Rise up, and come away. All that are by faith come to Christ, must come with Christ, in holy obedience to him, and compliance with him. Being joined to him, we must walk with him. This is his command to us daily, "Come with me, my spouse; come with me to God as a Father, come with me onward, heavenward, come forward with me, come up with me; come with me from Lebanon, from the top of Amana, from the lions' dens." These mountains are to be considered, (1.) As seemingly delightful places; Lebanon is called that goodly mountain, Dent. 3. 25. We read of the glory of Lebanon, (Isa. 35. 2.) and its goodly smell, Hos. 14. 6. We read of the pleasant dew of Hermon, (Ps. 133. 3.) and the joy of Hermon; (Ps. 89. 12.) and we may suppose the other mountains here mentioned to be pleasant ones; and so this is Christ's call to his spouse to come off from the world, all its products, all its pleasures, to sit loose to all the delights of sense; all those must do so that would come with Christ; they must take their affections off from all present things; yea, though they be placed at the upper end of the world, on the top of Amana, and the top of Shenir, though they enjoy the highest satisfactions the creature can propose to give, yet they must come away from them all, and live above the tops of the highest hills on earth, that they may have their conversation in heaven. Come from those mountains, to go along with Christ to the holy mountain, the mountain of myrrh, v. 6. Even while we have our residence on these mountains, yet we must look from them, look above them. Shall we lift up our eyes to the hills? No; our help comes from the Lord, Ps. 121. 1, 2. We must look beyond them, to the things that are not seen, (as these high hills are,) that are eternal. From the tops of Shenir and Hermon, which were on the other side Jordan, as from Pisgah, they could see the land of Canaan; from this world we must look forward to the better country. (2.) They are to be considered as really dangerous; these hills indeed are pleasant enough, but there are in them lions' dens; they are mountains of the leopards, mountains of prey, though they seem glorious and excellent, Ps. 76. 4. Satan, that roaring lion, is the prince of this world, in the things of it he lies in wait to devour; on the tops of these mountains there are many dangerous temptations to those who take up their residence in them; and therefore come with me from them; let us not set our hearts upon the things of this world, and then they can do us no hurt. Come with me from the temples of idolaters, and the societies of wicked people; so some understand it; Come out from among them, and be ye separate. Come from under the dominion of your own lusts, which are as lions and leopards, fierce upon us, and making us fierce.

2. It may be taken as a promise; Thou shalt come with me from Lebanon, from the lions' dens; that is, (1.) "Many shall be brought home to me, as living members of the church, from every point, from Lebanon in the north, Amara in the west, Hermon in the east, Shenir in the south, from all parts, to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Matth. 8. 11. See Isa. 49. 11, 12. Some from the tops of these mountains, some of the great men of this world, shall give themselves to Christ. (2.) The church shall be delivered from her persecutors, in due time: though now she dwells among lions, (Ps. 57. 4.) Christ will take her with himself from among their dens.

III. The great delight Christ takes in his church, and in all believers. He delights in them,

1. As in an agreeable bride, adorned for her husband, (Rev. 21. 2.) who greatly desires her beauty, Ps. 45. 11. No expressions of love can be more passionate than these here, in which Christ manifests his affection to his church; and yet that great proof of his love, his dying for it, that he might present it to himself a glorious church, goes far beyond them all. A spouse, so dearly bought and paid for, could not but be dearly loved; such a price being given for her, a high value must needs be put upon her accordingly; and both together may well set us a wondering at the height and depth, and length and breadth, of the love of Christ, which passes knowledge, that love in which he gave himself for us, and gives himself to us. Observe,

(1.) How he is affected towards his spouse; Thou hast ravished my heart; the word is used only here, Thou hast hearted me, or, Thou hast unhearted me. New words are coined to express the inexpressibleness of Christ's surprising love to his church; and the strength of that love is set forth by that which is a weakness in men, who are so much in love with one object, as to be heartless to every thing else. This may refer to that love which Christ had to the chosen remnant, before the worlds were, when his delights were with the sons of men, (Prov. 8. 31.) that first love, which brought him from heaven to earth, to seek and save them at such vast expence, yet including the complacency he takes in them when he brought them to himself. Note, Christ's heart is upon his church; so it has appeared all along; his treasure is in it, it is his peculiar treasure, (Exod. 19. 5.) and therefore there his heart is also. "Never was love like unto the love of Christ, which made him even mindless of himself, when he emptied himself of his glory, and despised all shame and pain, for our sakes. The wound of love towards us, which he had from eternity in himself, made him neglect all the wounds and reproaches of the cross;" so Bishop Reynolds here. Thus let us love him.

(2.) What it is that thus affects him with delight.

[1.] The regard she has to him; Thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes, those dove's eyes, clear and chaste, (which were commended, v. 1.) with one glance of those eyes. Christ is wonderfully pleased with those that look unto him as their Saviour, and through the eye of faith dart their affections to him above any rival whatsoever, and whose eyes are ever towards him; he is soon aware of the first look of a soul towards him, and meets it with his favours.

[2.] The ornaments she has from him, that is, the obedience she yields to him, for that is the chain of her neck, the graces that enrich her soul, which are connected as links in a chain; the exercise of these graces in a conversation which adorns both herself and the doctrine of Jesus Christ, which she professes to believe, as a gold chain is an ornament to persons of quality, and an entire submission to the commanding power of his law, and the constraining power of his love; having shaken off the bands of our neck, by which we were tied to this world, (Isa. 52. 2.) and the yoke of our transgressions, we are bound with the cords of love, as chains of gold, to Jesus Christ, and our necks are brought under his sweet and easy yoke, to draw in it; this recommends us to Jesus Christ, for this is that true wisdom which, in his account, is an ornament of grace unto the head, and chains about the neck, Prov. 1. 9.

[3.] The affection she has for him; How fair is thy love! how beautiful is it! Not only thy love itself, but all the fruits and products of it, its working in the heart, its works in the life. How well does it become a believer thus to love Christ, and what a pleasure does Christ take in it! Nothing recommends us to Christ so as this does. How much better is thy love than wine! Than all the wine that was poured out to the Lord in the drink-offerings; hence the fruit of the vine is said to cheer God and man, Judges, 9. 13. She had said of Christ's love, It is better than wine; (ch. 1. 2.) and now Christ says so of her's; there is nothing lost by praising Christ, nor will he be behindhand with his friends in kindness.

[4.] The ointments, the odours, wherewith she is perfumed, the gifts and graces of the Spirit, her good works, which are an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God, Phil. 4. 18. The smell of thine ointment is better than all spices, such as the queen of Sheba presented to Solomon, camel-loads of them, (1 Kings, 10. 2.) or, rather, than all the spices that were used in compounding the holy incense which was burned daily on the golden altar; love and obedience to God are more pleasing to Christ than sacrifice or incense. The smell of her garments too, the visible professions she makes of religion, and relation to Christ, before men, and wherein she appears to the world, this is very grateful to Christ, as the smell of Lebanon. Christ having put upon his spouse the white raiment of his own righteousness, (Rev. 3. 18.) and the righteousness of saints, (Rev. 19. 8.) and this perfumed with holy joy and comfort, he is well-pleased with it.

[5.] Her words, both in her devotions to God, and her discourses with men; (v. 11.) Thy lips, O my spouse, drop as the honeycomb, drop that which is very sweet, and drop it freely and plentifully. If what God speaks to us be sweeter to us than the honey and the honeycomb, (Ps. 19. 10.) what we say to him in prayer and praise shall also be pleasing to him; Sweet is thy voice. And if, out of a good treasure in the heart, we bring forth good things, if our speech be always with grace, if our lips use knowledge aright, if they disperse knowledge, they then, in Christ's account, even drop the honeycomb, out-drop it. Honey and milk (the two staple commodities of Canaan) are under thy tongue; that is, in thy heart; not only reserved there for thy own use as a sweet morsel for thyself, but ready there for the use of others. In the word of God there is sweet and wholesome nourishment, milk for babes, honey for those that are grown up, Christ is well-pleased with those that are full of his word.

2. As in a pleasant garden. And well may a very great delight be compared to the delight taken in a garden, when the happiness of Adam in innocency was represented by the putting of him in a garden, a garden of pleasure. This comparison is pursued, v. 12. 14. The church is fitly compared to a garden, to a garden which, as usual, had a fountain in it; where Solomon made him gardens and orchards, he made him pools of water, (Ecc. 2. 5, 6.) not only for curiosity and diversion, in water-works, but for use, to water the gardens; Eden was well-watered, Gen. 2. 10.—13. 10. Observe,

(1.) The peculiarity of this garden; it is a garden enclosed, a paradise separated from the common earth; it is appropriated to God, he has set it apart for himself. Israel is God's portion, the lot of his inheritance. It is inclosed for secrecy; the saints are God's hidden ones, therefore the world knows them not; Christ walks in his garden unseen. It is inclosed for safety; a hedge of protection is made about it, which all the powers of darkness cannot either find or make a gap in. God's vineyard is fenced; (Isa. 5. 2.) there is a wall about it, a wall of fire. It has a spring in it, and a fountain, but it is a spring shut up, and a fountain sealed, which sends its streams abroad, (Prov. 5. 16.) but it is itself carefully locked up, that it may not by any injurious hand be muddled or polluted. The souls of believers are as gardens inclosed; grace in them is as a spring shut up there in the hidden man of the heart, where the water that Christ gives is a well of living water, John, 4. 14.—7. 38. The Old-Testament church was a garden inclosed by the partition wall of the ceremonial law; the Bible was then a spring shut up and a fountain sealed, it was confined to one nation; but now the wall of separation is removed, the gospel preached to every nation, and in Jesus Christ there is neither Greek nor Jew.

(2.) The products of this garden; it is as the garden of Eden, where the Lord God made to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food, Gen. 2.9. Thy plants, or plantations, are an orchard of pomegranates with pleasant fruits, v. 13. It is not like the vineyard of the man void of understanding, that was all grown over with thorns and nettles; but here are fruits, pleasant fruits, all trees of frankincense, and all the chief spices, v. 14. Here is great plenty of fruits, and great variety, nothing wanting which might either beautify, or enrich, this garden, might make it either delightful or serviceable to its great Lord; every thing here is the best of the kind; their chief spices were much more valuable, because much more durable, than the choicest of our flowers. Solomon was a great master in botany as well as other parts of natural philosophy; he treated largely of trees, (1 Kings, 4. 33.) and perhaps had reference to some specific qualities of the fruits here specified, which made them very fit for the purpose for which he alludes to them; but we must be content to observe, in general, that saints in the church, and graces in the saints, are very fitly compared to these fruits and spices; for, [1.] They are planted, and do not grow of themselves; the trees of righteousness are the planting of the Lord, (Isa. 61. 3.) grace springs from an incorruptible seed. [2.] They are precious and of high value; hence we read of the precious sons of Zion and their precious faith, they are plants of renown. [3.] They are pleasant, and of a sweet savour to God and man, and, as strong aromatics, diffuse their fragrant. [4.] They are profitable and of great use; saints are the blessings of this earth, and their graces are their riches with which they trade as the merchants of the east with their spices. [5.] They are permanent, and will be preserved to good purpose, when flowers are withered and good for nothing. Grace, reduced into glory, will last for ever.

15. A fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon. 16. Awake, O north wind; and come, thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out. Let my beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits.

These seem to be the words of the spouse, the church, in answer to the commendations which Christ, the Bridegroom, had given of her as a pleasant fruitful garden. Is she a garden?

1. She owns her dependence upon Christ himself to make this garden fruitful; to him she has an eye, (v. 15.) as the Fountain of gardens, not only the Founder of them, by whom they are planted, and to whom they owe their being, but the Fountain of them, by whom they are watered, and to whom they owe their continuance and well-being, and without whose constant supplies they would soon become like the dry and barren wilderness; to him she gives all the glory of her fruitfulness, as being nothing without him: O Fountain of gardens, Fountain of all good, of all grace, do not thou fail me. Does a believer say to the church, All my springs are in thee, in thee, O Zion? (Ps. 87. 7.) The church transmits the praise to Christ, and says to him, All my springs are in thee; thou art the Well of living waters, (Jer. 2. 13.) out of which flow the streams from Lebanon, the river Jordan, which had its rise at the foot of mount Lebanon, and the waters of the sanctuary, which issued out from under the threshold of the house, Ezek. 47. 1. They that are gardens to Christ, must acknowledge him a Fountain to them, from whose fulness they receive, and to whom it is owing that their souls are as a watered garden, Jer. 31. 12. The city of God on earth is made glad with the river that flows from this Fountain, (Ps. 46. 4.) and the new Jerusalem has its pure river of water of life proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb, Rev. 22. 1.

2. She implores the influences of the blessed Spirit to make this garden fragrant; (v. 16.) Awake, O north-wind, and come, thou south. This is a prayer, (1.) For the church in general, that there may be a plentiful effusion of the Spirit upon it, in order to its flourishing estate. Ministers' gifts are the spices; when the Spirit is poured out, these flow forth, and then the wilderness becomes a fruitful field, Isa. 32. 15. This prayer was answered in the pouring out of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, (Acts, 2. 1.) ushered in by a mighty wind; then the apostles, who were bound up before, flowed forth, and were a sweet savour to God, 2 Cor. 2. 15. (2.) For particular believers. Note, [1.] Sanctified souls are as gardens, gardens of the Lord, inclosed for him. [2.] Graces in the soul are as spices in these gardens, that in them which is valuable and useful. [3.] It is very desirable that the spices of grace should flow forth both in pious and devout affections, and in holy, gracious actions, that with them we may honour God, adorn our profession, and do that which will be grateful to good men. [4.] The blessed Spirit, in his operations upon the soul, is as the north and the south wind, which blows where it listeth, and from several points, John, 3. 8. There is the north-wind of convictions, and the south-wind of comforts; but all, like the wind, brought out of God's treasures, and fulfilling his word. [5.] The flowing forth of the spices of grace depends upon the gales of the Spirit; he stirs up good affections, and works in us both to will and to do that which is good; it is he that makes manifest the savour of his knowledge by us. [6.] We ought therefore to wait upon the Spirit of grace for his quickening influences, to pray for them, and to lay our souls under them. God has promised to give us his Spirit, but he will for this be inquired of.

3. She invites Christ to the best entertainment the garden affords; Let my beloved then come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits; let him have the honour of all the products of the garden, it is fit he should, and let me have the comfort of his acceptance of them, for that is the best account they can be made to turn to. Observe, (1.) She calls it his garden; for those that are espoused to Christ call nothing their own, but what they have devoted to him, and desire to be used for him. When the spices flow forth, then it is fit to be called his garden, and not till then. The fruits of the garden are his pleasant fruits, for he planted them, watered them, and gave the increase. What can we pretend to merit at Christ's hands, when we can invite him to nothing but what is his own already? (2.) She begs he would visit it, and accept of what it produced. The believer can take little pleasure in his garden, unless Christ, the Beloved of his soul, come to him, nor have any joy of the fruits of it, unless they redound some way or other to the glory of Christ, and he will think all he has, well-bestowed upon him.

CHAP. V.

In this chapter, we have, I. Christ's gracious acceptance of the invitation which his church had given him, and the kind visit which he made to her, v. 1. II. The account which the spouse gives of her own folly, in putting a slight upon her Beloved, and the distress she was in, by reason of his withdrawals, v. 2. 8. III. The inquiry of the daughters of Jerusalem concerning the amiable perfections of her Beloved, (v. 9.) and her particular answer to that inquiry, v. 10. 16. Unto you that believe he is thus precious.

1. I AM come into my garden, my sister, my spouse: I have gathered my myrrh with my spice; I have eaten my honey comb with my honey; I have drunk my wine with my milk: eat, O friends; drink, yea drink abundantly, O beloved.

These words are Christ's answer to the church's prayer in the close of the foregoing chapter, Let my beloved come into his garden; here he is come, and lets her know it. See how ready God is to hear prayer; how ready Christ is to accept the invitations that his people give him, though we are backward to hear his calls, and accept his invitations. He is free in condescending to us, while we are shy of ascending to him. Observe how the return answered the request, and outdid it.

1. She called him her Beloved, (and really he was so,) and therefore invited him, because she loved him; in return to this, he called her his sister and spouse, as several times before, ch. 4. Those that make Christ their best Beloved, shall be owned by him in the nearest and dearest relations.

2. She called the garden his, and the pleasant fruits of it his, and he acknowledges them to be so; It is my garden, it is my spice. When God was displeased with Israel, he turned them off to Moses; They are thy people; (Exod. 32. 7.) and he called the appointed feasts of the Lord their appointed feasts; (Isa. 1. 14.) but, now that they are in his favour, he owns them for his garden; though of small account, yet it is mine. They that in sincerity give up themselves and all they have, and can do, to Jesus Christ, he will give them the honour to stamp them, and what they have, and do, for him, with his own mark, and say, It is mine.

3. She invited him to come into his garden, and he says, I am come, Isa. 58. 9. Thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am. When Solomon prayed that God would come, and take possession of the house he had built for him, he did come, his glory filled the house, (2 Chron. 7. 2.) and (v. 16.) he let him know that he had chosen and sanctified this house, that his name might be there for ever. They that throw open the door of their souls to Jesus Christ, shall find him ready to come into them; and in every place where he records his name, he will meet his people, and bless them, Exod. 20. 24.

4. She desired him to eat his pleasant fruits, to accept of the sacrifices offered in his temple, which were as the fruits of his garden, and he does so, but finds they were not ready for eating, therefore he does himself gather them; as the fruits are his, so is the preparation of them; he finds the heart unready for his entertainment, but does himself draw out into exercise those gracious habits which he had planted there. What little good there is in us, would be shed and lost if he did not gather it, and preserve it to himself.

5. She only desired him to eat the fruits of the garden, but he brought along with him something more, honey, and wine, and milk, which yield substantial nourishment, and which were the products of Canaan, Immanuel's land. Christ delights himself greatly in that which he has both conferred upon his people, and wrought in them. Or we may suppose this to have been prepared by the spouse herself, as Esther prepared for the king her husband a banquet of wine; it is but plain fare, and what is natural, honey and milk, but, being kindly designed, it is kindly accepted; imperfections are overlooked, the honey-comb is eaten with the honey, and the weakness of the flesh passed by, and pardoned, because the spirit is willing. When Christ appeared to his disciples after his resurrection, he did eat with them a piece of a honey-comb, (Luke, 24. 42, 43.) in which this scripture was fulfilled. He did not drink the wine only, which is liquor for men, for great men, but the milk too, which is liquor for children, little children, for he was to be the holy child Jesus, that had need of milk.

6. She only invited him to come himself, but he, bringing his own entertainment along with him, brings his friends too, and invites them to share in the provisions. The more the merrier, we say, and here, where there was so much plenty, there was not the worse fare. When our Lord Jesus fed five thousand at once, they did all eat, and were filled. Christ invites all his friends to the wine and milk which he himself drinks of, (Isa. 55. 1.) to the feast of fat things, and wines on the lees, Isa. 25. 6. The great work of man's redemption, and the riches of the covenant of grace, are a feast to the Lord Jesus, and they ought to be so to us. The invitation is very free, and hearty, and loving; Eat, O friends. If Christ comes to sup with us, it is we that sup with him, Rev. 3. 20. Eat, O friends. Those only that are Christ's friends are welcome to his table; his enemies, that will not have him to reign over them, have no part or lot in the matter. Drink, yea drink abundantly. Christ, in his gospel, has made plentiful provision for poor souls; he fills the hungry with good things; there is enough for all, there is enough for each, we are not straitened in him or in his grace; let us not therefore be straitened in our own bosoms. Open thy mouth wide, and Christ will fill it. Be not drunk with wine, be filled with the Spirit, Eph. 5. 18. Those that entertain Christ must bid his friends welcome with him; Jesus and his disciples were called together to the marriage, (John, 2. 2.) and Christ will have all his friends to rejoice with him in the day of his espousals to his church, and, in token of that, to feast with him. In spiritual and heavenly joys there is no danger of exceeding; there we may drink abundantly, drink of the river of God's pleasures, (Ps. 36. 8.) and be abundantly satisfied, Ps. 65. 4.

2. I sleep, but my heart waketh: it is the voice of my beloved that knocketh, saying, Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled: for my head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night. 3. I have put off my coat; how shall I put it on? I have washed my feet; how shall I defile them? 4. My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door, and my bowels were moved for him. 5. I rose up to open to my beloved; and my hands dropped with myrrh, and my fingers with sweet-smelling myrrh, upon the handles of the lock. 6. I opened to my beloved, but my beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone: my soul failed when he spake: I sought him, but I could not find him; I called him, but he gave me no answer. 7. The watchmen that went about the city found me, they smote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my vail from me. 8. I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem, if ye find my beloved, that ye tell him, that I am sick of love.

In this song of loves and joys, we have here a very melancholy scene; the spouse here speaks, not to her Beloved, (as before, for he is withdrawn,) but of him, and it is a sad story she tells of her own folly and ill conduct toward him, notwithstanding his kindness, and of the just rebukes she fell under for it; perhaps it may refer to Solomon's own apostasy from God, and the sad effects of that apostasy, after God had come into his garden, had taken possession of the temple he had built, and he had feasted with God upon the sacrifices; (v. 1.) however, it is applicable to the too common case both of churches and particular believers, who by their carelessness and security provoke Christ to withdraw from them. Observe,

1. The indisposition that the spouse was under, and the listlessness that had seized her; (v. 2.) I sleep, but my heart wakes. Here is, 1. Corruption appearing in the actings of it; I sleep; the wise virgins slumbered. She was on her bed, (ch. 3. 1.) but now she sleeps. Spiritual distempers, if not striven against at first, are apt to grow upon us, and to get ground. She slept; pious affections cooled, she neglected her duty, and grew remiss in it, she indulged herself in her ease, was secure and off her watch. This is sometimes the bad effect of more than ordinary enlargements, a good cause. St. Paul himself was in danger of being puffed up with abundant revelations, and of saying, Soul, take thine ease, which made a thorn in the flesh necessary for him, to keep him from sleeping. Christ's disciples, when he was come into his garden, the garden of his agony, were heavy with sleep, and could not watch with him. True Christians are not always alike lively and vigorous in religion. 2. Grace remaining, notwithstanding, in the habit of it; "My heart wakes, my own conscience reproaches me for it, and ceases not to rouse me out of my sluggishness. The spirit is willing, and, after the inner man, I delight in the law of God, and with my mind I serve that. I am, for the present, overpowered by temptation, but all does not go one way in me. I sleep, but it is not a dead sleep, I strive against it, it is not a sound sleep, I cannot be easy under this indisposition." Note, (1.) We ought to take notice of our own spiritual slumbers and distempers, and to reflect upon it with sorrow and shame that we have fallen asleep, when Christ has been nigh us in his garden. (2.) When we are lamenting what is amiss in us, we must not overlook the good that is wrought in us, and preserved alive. "My heart wakes in Christ, who is dear to me as my own heart, and is my Life; when I sleep, he neither slumbers nor sleeps."

II. The call that Christ gave to her, when she was under this indisposition; It is the voice of my Beloved; she knew it to be so, and was soon aware of it, which was a sign that her heart was awake. Like the child Samuel, she heard at the first call, but did not, like him, mistake the person; she knew it to be the voice of Christ. He knocks, to awaken us to come and let him in; knocks by his word and Spirit, knocks by afflictions and by our own consciences; though this is not expressly quoted, yet, probably, it is referred to, (Rev. 3. 20.) Behold, I stand at the door, and knock. He calls sinners into covenant with him, and saints into communion with him. Those whom he loves he will not let alone in their carelessness, but will find some way or other to awaken them, to rebuke and chasten them. When we are unmindful of Christ, he thinks of us, and provides that our faith fail not. Peter denied Christ, but the Lord turned, and looked upon him, and so brought him to himself again.

Observe how moving the call is, Open to me, my sister, my love. 1. He sues for entrance, who may demand it; and knocks, who could easily knock the door down. 2. He gives her all the kind and most endearing titles imaginable, My sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled; he not only gives her no hard names, nor upbraids her with unkindness in not sitting up for him, but, on the contrary, studies how to express his tender affection to her still; his loving-kindness he will not utterly take away. Those that by faith are espoused to Christ, he looks upon as his sisters, his loves, his doves, and all that is dear; and, being clothed with his righteousness, they are undefiled. This consideration should induce her to open to him. Christ's love to us should engage our's to him, even in the most self-denying instances. Open to me. Can we deny entrance to such a friend, to such a guest? Shall we not converse more with one that is infinitely worthy of our acquaintance, and so affectionately desirous of it, though we only can be gainers by it? 3. He pleads distress, and begs to be admitted sub forma pauperis—under the character of a poor traveller, that wants a lodging; "My head is wet with the dew, with the cold drops of the night; consider what hardships I have undergone to merit thee, which surely may merit from thee so small a kindness as this." When Christ was crowned with thorns, which, no doubt, fetched blood from his blessed head, then was his head wet with the dew; "Consider what a grief it is to me to be thus unkindly used, as much as it would be to a tender husband to be kept out of doors by his wife in a rainy stormy night." Do we thus requite him for his love? The slights which careless souls put upon Jesus Christ are to him as a continual dropping in a very rainy day.

III. The excuse she made to put off her compliance with this call; (v. 3.) I have put off my coat, how shall I put it on again? She is half asleep, she knows the voice of her Beloved, she knows his knock, but cannot find in her heart to open to him; she was undressed, and would not be at the pains to dress her again; she had washed her feet, and would not have occasion to wash them again. She could not send another to open the door, (it must be our own act and deed to let Christ into our hearts,) and yet she was loath to go herself; she did not say, I will not open, but, How shall I? Note, Frivolous excuses are the language of prevailing slothfulness in religion; Christ calls to us to open to him, but we pretend we have no mind, or we have no strength, or we have no time, and therefore think we may be excused, as the sluggard that will not plough by reason of cold. And those who ought to watch for the Lord's coming, with their lains girt, if they ungird themselves, and put off their coat, they will find it difficult to recover their former resolution, and to put it on again; it is best therefore to keep tight. Making excuses, (Luke, 14. 18.) is interpreted making light of Christ; (Matth. 22. 5.) and so it is. Those put a great contempt upon Christ that cannot find in their hearts to bear a cold blast for him, or get out of a warm bed.

IV. The powerful influences of divine grace, by which she was made willing to rise, and open to her Beloved. When he could not prevail with her by persuasion, he put in his hand by the hole of the door, to unbolt it, as one weary of waiting, v. 4. This intimates a work of the Spirit upon her soul, by which she was of unwilling made willing, Ps. 110. 3. The conversion of Lydia is represented by the opening of her heart, (Acts, 16. 14.) and Christ is said to open his disciples' understandings, Luke, 24. 45. He that formed the spirit of man within him knows all the avenues to it, and which way to enter into it; he can find the hole of the door, at which to put in his hand for the conquering of prejudices, and the introducing of his own doctrine and law. He has the key of David, (Rev. 3. 7.) with which he opens the door of the heart in such a way as is suited to it, as the key is fitted to the wards of the lock; in such a way as not to put a force upon its nature, but only upon its ill nature.

V. Her compliance with these methods of divine grace at last; My bowels were moved for him. The will was gained by a good work wrought upon the affections; My bowels were moved for him, as those of the two disciples were, when Christ made their heart to burn within them. She was moved with compassion to her Beloved, because his head was wet with the dew. Note, Tenderness of spirit, and a heart of flesh, prepare the soul for the reception of Christ into it; and therefore his love to us is represented in such a way as is most affecting. Did Christ redeem us in his pity? Let us in pity receive him, and, for his sake, those that are his, when at any time they are in distress.

This good work, wrought upon her affections, raised her up, and made her ashamed of her dulness and slothfulness; (v. 5.) I rose up to open to my Beloved; his grace inclining her to do it, and conquering the opposition of unbelief. It was her own act, and yet he wrought it in her. And now her hands dropped with myrrh upon the handles of the lock. Either, 1. She found it there when she applied her hand to the lock, to shoot it back; he that put in his hand by the hole of the door, left it there as an evidence that he had been there. When Christ has wrought powerfully upon a soul, he leaves a blessed sweetness in it, which is very delightful to it; with this he oiled the lock, to make it go easy. Note, When we apply ourselves to our duty, in the lively exercises of faith, under the influence of divine grace, we shall find it will go on much more readily and sweetly than we expected. If we will but rise up, to open to Christ, we shall find the difficulty we apprehended in it, strangely overcome, and shall say with Daniel, Now let my Lord speak, for thou hast strengthened me, Dan. 10. 19. Or, 2. She brought it thither. Her bowels being moved for her Beloved, who had stood so long in the cold and wet, when she came to open to him, she prepared to anoint his head, and so to refresh and comfort him, and perhaps to prevent his catching cold; she was in such haste to meet him, that she would not stay to make the usual preparation, but dipped her hand in her box of ointment, that she might readily anoint his head, at his first coming in. Those that open the doors of their hearts to Christ, those everlasting doors, must meet him with the lively exercises of faith, and other graces, and with these must anoint him.

VI. Her sad disappointment, when she did open to her Beloved. And here is the most melancholy part of the story; I opened to my Beloved, as I intended, but, alas! my Beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone; my Beloved was gone, was gone, so the word is. She did not open to him at his first knock, and now she came too late, when afterward she would have inherited this blessing. Christ will be sought while he may be found; if we slip our time, we lose our passage. Note, 1. Christ justly rebukes our delays with his denials, and suspends the communications of comfort from those that are remiss and drowsy in their duty. 2. Christ's departures are matter of great grief and lamentation to believers. The royal psalmist never complains of any thing with such sorrowful accents as God's hiding his face from him, and casting him off, and forsaking him. The spouse here is ready to tear her hair, and rend her clothes, and wring her hands, crying, He is gone, he is gone; and that which cuts her to the heart, is, that she may thank herself, she provoked him to withdraw. If Christ departs, it is because he takes something unkindly.

Now observe what she does, in this case, and what befell her.

(1.) She still calls him her Beloved, being resolved, how cloudy and dark soever the day be, she will not quit her relation to him, and interest in him. It is a weakness, upon every apprehension either of our own failings, or of God's withdrawals, to conclude hardly as to our spiritual state. Every desertion is not despair. I will say, Lord, I believe, though I must say, Lord, help my unbelief. Though he leave me, I love him, he is mine.

(2.) She now remembers the words he said to her, when he called her, and what impressions they made upon her, reproaching herself for her folly in not complying sooner with her convictions. "My soul failed when he spake; his words melted me when he said, My head is wet with the dew; and yet, wretch that I was! I lay still, and made excuses, and did not open to him." The smothering and stifling of our convictions is a thing that will be very bitter in the reflection, when God opens our eyes. Sometimes the word has not its effect immediately upon the heart, but it melts it afterward, upon second thoughts; My soul now melted because of his words which he had spoken before.

(3.) She did not go to bed again, but went in pursuit of him; I sought him, I called him. She might have saved herself this labour, if she would but have bestirred herself, when he first called; but we cut ourselves out a great deal of work, and create ourselves a great deal of trouble, by our own slothfulness and carelessness in improving our opportunities. Yet it is her praise, that, when her Beloved is withdrawn, she continues seeking him; her desires toward him are made more strong, and her inquiries after him more solicitous, by his withdrawals. She calls him by prayer, calls after him, and begs of him to return; and she not only prays, but uses means, she seeks him in the ways wherein she used to find him.

(4.) Yet still she missed of him; I could not find him, he gave me no answer. She had no evidence of his favour, no sensible comforts, but was altogether in the dark, and in doubt, concerning his love toward her. Note, There are those who have a true love for Christ, and yet have not immediate answers to their prayers for his smiles; but he gives them an equivalent, if he strengthens them with strength in their souls, to continue seeking him, Ps. 138. 3. St. Paul could not prevail for the removing of the thorn in the flesh, but was answered with grace sufficient for him.

(5.) She was ill-treated by the watchmen; They found me, they smote me, they wounded me, v. 7. They took her for a lewd woman, (because she went about the streets at that time of night, when they were walking their rounds,) and beat her accordingly. Disconsolate saints are taken for sinners, and are censured and reproached as such. Thus Hannah, when she was praying in the bitterness of her soul, was wounded and smitten by Eli, one of the prime watchmen, when he said to her, How long wilt thou be drunken? So counting her a daughter of Belial, 1 Sam. 1. 14, 15. It is no new thing for those that are of the loyal loving subjects of Zion's King, to be misrepresented by the watchmen of Zion, as enemies, or scandals, to his kingdom; they could not abuse and persecute them but by putting them into an ill-name. Some apply it to those ministers who, though watchmen by office, yet misapply the word to awakened consciences, and, through unskillfulness, or contempt of their griefs, add affliction to the afflicted, and make the hearts of the righteous sad, whom God would not have made sad, (Ezek. 13. 22.) discouraging those who ought to be encouraged, and talking to the grief of those whom God has wounded, Ps. 59. 26. Those watchmen were bad enough, that could not, or would not, assist the spouse in her inquiries after her Beloved; (ch. 3. 3.) but these were much worse that hindered her with their severe and uncharitable censures, smote her and wounded her with their reproaches, and, though they were the keepers of the wall of Jerusalem, as if they had been the breakers of it, took away her vail from her, rudely and barbarously, as if it had been only a pretence of modesty, but a cover of the contrary. They whose outward appearances are all good, and yet are invidiously condemned, and run down, for hypocrites, have reason to complain, as the spouse here, of the taking away of their vail from them.

(6.) When she was disabled by the abuses the watchman gave her, to prosecute her inquiry herself, she gave charge to those about her, to assist her in the inquiry; (v. 8.) I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, all my friends and acquaintance, if you find my Beloved, it may be you may meet with him before I shall, what shall ye tell him? So some read it; "Speak a good word for me, tell him that I am sick of love." Observe here, [1.] What her condition was, she loved Jesus Christ to that degree, that his absence made her sick, extremely sick, she could not bear it, and she was in pain for his return, as a woman in travail, as Ahab for Naboth's vineyard, which he so passionately coveted. This is a sickness which is a sign of a healthful constitution of soul, and will certainly end well, a sickness that will be not death, but life. It is better to be sick of love to Christ than at ease in love to the world. [2.] What course she took in this condition; she did not sink into despair, and conclude she should die of her disease, but she sent after her Beloved; she asked the advice of her neighbours, and begged their prayers for her, that they would intercede with him on her behalf; "Tell him, though I was careless, and foolish, and slothful, and rose not up so soon as I should have done, to open to him, yet I love him; he knows all things, he knows that I do; represent me to him as sincere, though in many instances coming short of my duty; nay, represent me to him as an object of his pity, that he may have compassion on me, and help me." She does not bid them tell him how the watchmen had abused her; how unrighteous soever they were in it, she acknowledges that the Lord is righteous, and therefore bears it patiently; but "Tell him that I am wounded with love to him." Gracious souls are more sensible of Christ's withdrawals than of any other trouble whatsoever.

The lover languishes, but not his love.

9. What is thy beloved more than another beloved, O thou fairest among women? what is thy beloved more than another beloved, that thou dost so charge us? 10. My beloved is white and ruddy, the chiefest among ten thousand. 11. His head is as the most fine gold, his locks are bushy, and black as a raven. 12. His eyes are as the eyes of doves by the rivers of waters, washed with milk, and fitly set. 13. His cheeks are as a bed of spices, as sweet flowers: his lips like lilies, dropping sweet-smelling myrrh. 14. His hands are as gold rings set with the beryl: his belly is as bright ivory overlaid with sapphires. 15. His legs are as pillars of marble, set upon sockets of fine gold: his countenance is as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars. 16. His mouth is most sweet: yea, he is altogether lovely. This is my beloved, and this is my friend, O daughters of Jerusalem.

Here is,

1. The question which the daughters of Jerusalem put to the spouse concerning her Beloved, in answer to the charge she had given them, v. 9. Observe,

1. The respectful title they give to the spouse, O thou fairest among women. Our Lord Jesus makes his spouse truly amiable, not only in his eyes, but in the eyes of all the daughters of Jerusalem. The church is the most excellent society in the world; the communion of saints the best communion, and the beauty of the sanctuary a transcendent beauty; the saints are the most excellent people; holiness is the symmetry of the soul; it is its agreement with itself, it recommends itself to all that are competent judges of it; even those that have little acquaintance with Christ, as those daughters of Jerusalem here, cannot but see an amiable beauty in those that bear his image, which we should love, wherever we see it, though in different dresses.

2. Their inquiry concerning her Beloved. "What is thy Beloved more than another beloved? If thou wilt have us to find him for thee, give us his marks, that we may know him, when we see him."

(1.) Some take it for a flighty question, blaming her for making such ado about him; "Why shouldst thou be so passionate in inquiring after thy Beloved, more than others are after their's? Why shouldst thou be so set upon him more than others that yet have a kindness for him?" Those that are zealous in religion are men wondered at by such as are indifferent to it. The many careless ones laugh at the few that are solicitous and serious, "What is there in him, that is so very charming, more than in another person? If he be gone, thou, who art the fairest among women, wilt soon have another with an equal flame." Note, Carnal hearts see nothing excellent or extraordinary in the Lord Jesus, in his person or offices, in his doctrine or in his favours; as if there were no more in the knowledge of Christ, and in communion with him, than in the knowledge of the world, and in its conversation.

(2.) Others rather take it for a serious question, and suppose that they who put it, intended, [1.] To comfort the spouse, who, they knew, would recover new spirits, if she did but talk awhile of her Beloved; nothing would please her better, or give a more powerful diversion to her grief, than to be put upon the pleasing task of describing the beauties of her Beloved. [2.] To inform themselves; they had heard, in general, that he was excellent and glorious, but they desired to know more particularly. They wondered what moved the spouse to charge them concerning her Beloved, with so much vehemence and concern, and therefore concluded there must be something more in him than in another beloved, which they are willing to be convinced of. Then there begin to be some hopes of people, when they begin to inquire concerning Christ and his transcendent perfections. And sometimes the extraordinary zeal of one, in inquiring after Christ, may be a means to provoke many; (2 Cor. 9. 2.) as the apostle, by the faith of the Gentiles, would stir up the Jews to a holy emulation, Rom. 11. 14. See John, 4. 10.

II. The account which the spouse gives of her Beloved, in answer to this question. We should always be ready to instruct and assist those that are inquiring after Christ. Experienced Christians, who are well acquainted with Christ themselves, should do all they can to make others acquainted with him.

1. She assures them, in general, that he is one of incomparable perfections, and unparalleled worth; (v. 10.) "Do not you know my Beloved? Can the daughters of Jerusalem be ignorant of him that is Jerusalem's Crown, and crowned Head? Let me tell you them."

(1.) That he has every thing in him that is lovely and amiable; My beloved is white and ruddy, the colours that make up a complete beauty. This points not at any extraordinary beauty of his body, when he should be incarnate. It was never said of the child Jesus, as of the child Moses when he was born, that he was exceeding fair; (Acts. 7. 20.) nay, he had no form nor comeliness, (Isa. 53. 2.) but his divine glory, and the concurrence of every thing in him as Mediator, to make him truly lovely in the eyes of those that are enlightened to discern spiritual things. In him we may behold the beauty of the Lord, he was the holy child Jesus, that was his fairness. If we look upon him as made to us Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption, he appears, in all, very amiable. His love to us renders him lovely; he is white in the spotless innocence of his life, ruddy in the bloody sufferings he went through at his death; white in his glory, as God; (when he was transfigured, his raiment was white as the light;) ruddy in his assuming the nature of man, Adam—red earth; white in his tenderness toward his people, ruddy in his terrible appearances against his and their enemies. His complexion is a very happy composition.

(2.) That he has that loveliness in him which is not to be found in any other; He is the chiefest among ten thousand; a nonsuch for beauty, fairer than the children of men, than any of them, than all of them; there is none like him, nor any to be compared with him; every thing else is to be accounted loss and dung, in comparison of him, Phil. 3. 8. He is higher than the kings of the earth, (Ps. 89. 27.) and has obtained a more excellent name than any of the principalities and powers of the upper or lower world, Phil. 2. 9. Heb. 1. 4. He is a Standard-Bearer among ten thousand; so the word is, the tallest and comeliest of the company. He is himself lifted up as an Ensign, (Isa. 11. 10.) to whom we must be gathered, and must always have an eye. And there is all the reason in the world that he should have the innermost and uppermost place in our souls, who is the fairest of ten thousands in himself, and the finest of twenty thousands for us.

2. She gives a particular detail of his accomplishments, conceals not his power or comely proportion; every thing in Christ is amiable. Ten instances she here gives of his beauty, which we need not be nice in the application of, lest the wringing of them bring forth blood, and prove the wresting of them. The design, in general, is, to shew that he is every way qualified for his undertaking, and has all that in him which may recommend him to our esteem, love, and confidence. Christ's appearance to John, (Rev. 1. 13, &c.) may be compared with the description which the spouse gives of him here, the scope of both being to represent him transcendently glorious, that is, both great and gracious, made lovely in the eyes of believers, and making them happy in himself.

(1.) His head is as the most fine gold; The head of Christ is God, (1 Cor. 11. 3.) and it is promised to the saints, that the Almighty shall be their Gold, (Job, 22. 25.) their Defence, their Treasure; much more was he so to Christ, in whom dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, Col. 2. 9. Christ's head bespeaks his sovereign dominion over all, and his vital influence upon his church and all its members; this is as gold, gold; the former word signifies shining gold, the latter strong solid gold; Christ's sovereignty is both beautiful and powerful. Nebuchadnezzar's monarchy is compared to a head of gold, (Dan. 2. 38.) because it excelled all the other monarchies, and so does Christ's government.

(2.) His locks are bushy and black; not black as the tents of Kedar, whose blackness was their deformity, to which therefore the church compares herself, (ch. 1. 5.) but black as a raven, whose blackness is his beauty. Sometimes Christ's hair is represented as white, (Rev. 1. 14.) denoting his eternity, that he is the Ancient of days; but here as black and bushy, bespeaking him ever young, and that there is in him no decay, nothing that waxes old. Every thing that belongs to Christ is amiable in the eyes of a believer, even his hair is so; it was pity that it should be wet, as it was, with the dew, and these locks with the drops of the night, while he waited to be gracious, v. 2.

(3.) His eyes are as the eyes of doves, fair and clear, and chaste and kind, by the rivers of waters, which doves delight in, and in which, as in a glass, they see themselves; they are washed, to make them clean, washed with milk, to make them white, and fifty set, neither starting out nor sunk in. Christ is of purser eyes than to behold iniquity, for they are doves' eyes, Hab. 1. 13. All believers speak with pleasure of the omniscience of Christ, as the spouse here of his eyes; for though it be terrible to his enemies as a flame of fire, (Rev. 1. 14.) yet it is amiable and comfortable to his friends, as doves' eyes, for it is a witness to their integrity; Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee. Blessed and holy are they that walk always as under the eye of Christ.

(4.) His cheeks (the risings of the face) are as a bed of spices, raised in the gardens, which are the beauty and wealth of them, and as sweet flowers, or towers of sweetness. There is that in Christ's countenance which is amiable in the eyes of all the saints, in the least glimpse of him, for the cheek is but a part of the face. The half discoveries Christ makes of himself to the soul are reviving and refreshing, fragrant above the richest flowers and perfumes.

(5.) His lips are like lilies, not white like lilies, but sweet and pleasant: such are the words of his lips to all that are sanctified, sweeter than honey, and the honey-comb; such the kisses of his lips, all the communications of his grace; grace is poured into his lips, and they that heard him wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. His lips are as lilies, dropping sweet-smelling myrrh. Never any lilies in nature dropped myrrh, but nothing in nature can fully set forth the beauty and excellency of Christ, and therefore, to do it by comparison, there must be a composition of images.

(6.) His hands are as gold rings set with the beryl, a noted precious stone, v. 14. Great men had their hands adorned with gold rings on their fingers, set with diamonds or others precious stones; but, in her eye, his hands themselves were as gold rings; all the instances of his power, the works of his hands, all the performances of his providence and grace, are all rich, and pure, and precious gold, as the precious onyx and the sapphire; all fitted to the purpose for which they were designed, as gold rings to the finger; and all beautiful and very becoming, as rings set with beryl. His hands, which are stretched forth, both to receive his people, and to give to them, are thus rich and comely.

(7.) His bowels are as bright ivory, for so it should be rendered, rather than his belly, for it is the same word that was used for bowels, (v. 4.) and is often ascribed to God, (as Isa. 63. 15. Jer. 31. 20.) and so it denotes his tender compassion and affection for his spouse, and the love he has to her even in her desolate and deserted state. This love of his is like bright ivory finely polished, and richly overlaid with sapphires. The love itself is strong and firm, and the instances and circumstances of it are bright and sparkling, and add much to the inestimable value of it.

(8.) His legs are as pillars of marble, so strong, so stately, and no disgrace, no, not to the sockets of fine gold, upon which they are set, v. 15. This bespeaks his stability and steadfastness; where he sets his foot, he will fix it; he is able to bear all the weight of the government that is upon his shoulders, and his legs will never fail under him; this sets forth the stateliness and magnificence of the goings of our God, our King, in his sanctuary, (Ps. 68. 24.) and the steadiness and evenness of all his dispensations toward his people. The ways of the Lord are equal, they are all mercy and truth; these are the pillars of marble, more lasting than the pillars of heaven.

(9.) His countenance (his port and mien) is as Lebanon, that stately hill; his aspect beautiful and charming, like the prospect of that pleasant forest or park, excellent as the cedars, which, in height and strength, excel other trees, and are of excellent use. Christ is a goodly Person; the more we look upon him the more beauty we shall see in him.

(10.) His mouth is most sweet, it is sweetness itself, it is sweetnesses; so the word is; it is pure essence, nay, it is the quintessence of all delights, v. 16. The words of his mouth are all sweet to a believer, sweet as milk to babes, to whom it is agreeable, as honey to those that are grown up, (Ps. 119. 103.) to whom it is delicious. The kisses of his mouth, all the tokens of his love, have a transcendent sweetness in them, and are most delightful to them who have their spiritual senses exercised. To you that believe he is precious.

3. She concludes with a full assurance both of faith and hope, and so gets the mastery of her trouble.

(1.) Here is a full assurance of faith concerning the complete beauty of the Lord Jesus; "He is altogether lovely." Why should I stand to mention particulars, when throughout there is nothing amiss? She is sensible she does him wrong in the particular descriptions of him, and comes far short of the dignity and merit of the subject, and therefore she breaks off with this general encomium; He is truly lovely, he is wholly so; there is nothing in him but what is amiable, and nothing amiable but what is in him; he is all desires, he has all in him that one can desire, and therefore all her desire is towards him, and she seeks him thus carefully, and cannot rest contented in the want of him. Who cannot but love him who is so lovely?

(2.) Here is a full assurance of hope concerning her own interest in him; "This is my Beloved, and this is my Friend"; and therefore wonder not that I thus long after him." See with what a holy boldness she claims relation to him, and then with what a holy triumph she proclaims it. It is propriety that sweetens excellency. To see Christ, and not to see him as our's, would be rather a torture than a happiness; but to see one that is thus lovely, and to see him as our's, is a complete satisfaction. Here is a true believer,

[1.] Giving an entire consent to Christ; "He is mine; my Lord, and my God"; (John, 20. 28.) mine, according to the tenor of the gospel-covenant; mine in all relations; bestowed upon me, to be all that to me that my poor soul stands in need of."

[2.] Taking an entire complacency in Christ. It is spoken of here with an air of triumph; "This is he whom I have chosen, and to whom I have given up myself; none but Christ, none but Christ; this is he on whom my heart is, for he is my Best-Beloved; this is he in whom I trust, and from whom I expect all good, for this is my Friend." Note, Those that make Christ their Beloved, shall have him their Friend; he has been, is, and will be, a special Friend to all believers. He loves those that love him; and those that have him their Friend have reason to glory in him, and speak of him with delight. "Let others be governed by the love of the world, and seek their happiness in its friendship and favours, This is my Beloved, and this is my Friend. Others may do as they please, but this is my soul's Choice, my soul's Rest, my Life, my Joy, my All; this is he whom I desire to live and die with."

CHAP. VI.

In this chapter, I. The daughters of Jerusalem, moved with the description which the church had given of Christ, inquire after him, v. 1. II. The church directs them where they may meet with him, v. 2, 3. III. Christ is now found of those that sought him, and very highly applauds the beauty of his spouse, as one extremely smitten with it, (v. 4. 7.) preferring her before all others, (v. 8, 9.) recommending her to the love and esteem of all her neighbours, (v. 10.) and, lastly, acknowledging the impressions which her beauty had made upon him, and the great delight he took in it, v. 11. 13.

1. WHITHER is thy beloved gone, O thou fairest among women? whither is thy beloved turned aside? that we may seek him with thee. 2. My beloved is gone down into his garden, to the beds of spices, to feed in the gardens, and to gather lilies. 3. I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine: he feedeth among the lilies.

Here is,

I. The inquiry which the daughters of Jerusalem made concerning Christ, v. 1. They still continue their high thoughts of the church, and call her, as before, the fairest among women; for true sanctity is true beauty. And now they raise their thoughts higher concerning Christ, Whither is thy Beloved gone? that we may seek him with thee. This would be but an indecent, unacceptable, compliment, if the song were not to be understood spiritually; for love is jealous of a rival, would monopolize the Beloved, and cares not that others should join in seeking him; but they that truly love Christ are desirous that others should love him too, and be joined to him; nay, the greatest instance of duty and respect that the church's children can shew to their mother, is, to join with her in seeking Christ.

The daughters of Jerusalem, who had asked, (ch. 5. 9.) What is thy Beloved more than another beloved? wondering that the spouse should be so passionately in love with him, are now of another mind, and are themselves in love with him; for, 1. The spouse had described him, and shewed them his excellencies and perfections; and therefore, though they have not seen him, yet, believing, they love him. They that undervalue Christ, do so because they do not know him; when God, by his word and Spirit, discovers him to the soul, with that ray of light the fire of love to him will be kindled. 2. She had expressed her own love to him; her rest in that love, and had triumphed in it; This is my Beloved; and that flame in her breast scattered sparks into their's. As sinful lusts, when they break out, defile many, so the pious zeal of some may provoke many, 2 Cor. 9. 2.

The spouse had bespoken their help in seeking her Beloved; (ch. 5. 8.) but now they beg her's, for they perceive that now the cloud she had been under began to scatter, and the sky to clear up, and, while she was describing her Beloved to them, she herself retrieved her comfort in him. Drooping Christians would find benefit themselves by talking of Christ, as well as do good to others.

Now here, (1.) They inquire concerning him, "Whither is thy Beloved gone?" Which way must we steer our course, in pursuit of him? Note, Those that are made acquainted with the excellencies of Christ, and the comfort of an interest in him, cannot but be inquisitive after him, and desirous to know where they may meet with him. (2.) They offer their service to the spouse to accompany her in quest of him; We will seek him with thee. Those that would find Christ must seek him, seek him early, seek him diligently; and it is best seeking Christ in concert, to join with those that are seeking him. We must seek for communion with Christ, in communion with saints. We know whither our Beloved is gone; he is gone to heaven, to his Father, and our Father, he took care to send us notice of it, that we might know how to direct to him, John. 20. 17. We must by faith see him there, and by prayer seek him there; with boldness enter into the holiest, and herein must join with the generation of them that seek him, (Ps. 24. 6.) even with all that in every place call upon him, 1 Cor. 1. 2. We must pray with, and for, others.

II. The answer which the spouse gave to this inquiry, v. 2, 3. Now she complains not any more as she had done, (ch. 5. 6.) "He is gone, he is gone," that she knew not where to find him, or doubted she had lost him for ever; no,

1. Now she knows very well where he is; (v. 2.) "My Beloved is not to be found in the streets of the city, and the crowd and noise that are there, there I have in vain looked for him;" (as his parents sought him among their kindred and acquaintance, and found him not;) "but he is gone down to his garden, a place of privacy and retirement." The more we withdraw from the hurry of the world, the more likely we are to have acquaintance with Christ, who took his disciples into a garden, there to be witnesses of the agonies of his love. Christ's church is a garden inclosed, and separated from the open common of the world; it is his garden, which he has planted, as he did the garden of Eden, which he takes care of, and delights in: though he is gone up to paradise above, yet he comes down to his garden on earth; it lies low, but he condescends to visit it, and wonderful condescension it is. Will God in very deed dwell with man upon the earth? Those that would find Christ, may expect to meet with him in his garden, the church, for there he records his name; (Exod. 20. 24.) they must attend upon him in the ordinances which he has instituted, the word, sacraments, and prayer, wherein he will be with us always, even to the end of the world. The spouse here refers to what Christ had said, (ch. 5. 1.) I am come into my garden; it is as if she had said, "What a fool was I to fret and toil myself in seeking him where he was not, when he himself had told me where he was." Words of direction and comfort are often out of the way, when we have occasion to use them, till the blessed Spirit brings them to our remembrance, and then we wonder how we overlooked them. Christ has told us that he would come into his garden, thither therefore we must go to seek him.

The beds, and lesser gardens, in this greater, are the particular churches, the synagogues of God in the land; (Ps. 74. 8.) the spices and lilies are particular believers, the planting of the Lord, and pleasant in his eyes. When Christ comes down to his church, it is, (1.) To feed among the gardens, to feed his flock, which he feeds not, as other shepherds, in the open fields, but in his garden; so well are they provided for! Ps. 23. 2. He comes to feed his friends, and entertain them; there you may not only find him, but find his table richly furnished, and a hearty welcome to it. He comes to feed himself, to please himself with the products of his own grace in his people; for the Lord takes pleasure in those that fear him. He has many gardens, many particular churches of different sizes and shapes; but, while they are his, he feeds in them all, manifests himself among them, and is well-pleased with them. (2.) To gather lilies, wherewith he is pleased to entertain and adorn himself; he picks the lilies one by one, and gathers them to himself; and there will be a general harvest of them at the great day, when he will send forth his angels, to gather all his lilies, that he may be for ever glorified and admired in them.

2. She is very confident of her own interests in him; (v. 3.) "I am my Beloved's and my Beloved is mine; the relation is mutual, and the knot is tied, which cannot be loosed, for he feeds among the lilies, and my communion with him is a certain token of my interest in him." She had said this before; (ch. 2. 16.) but, (1.) Here she repeats it, as that which she resolved to abide by, and which she took an unspeakable pleasure and satisfaction in; she liked her choice too well to change. Our communion with God is very much maintained and kept up by the frequent renewing of our covenant with him, and rejoicing in it. (2.) She had occasion to repeat it, for she had acted unkindly to her Beloved, and, for her so doing, he had justly withdrawn himself from her, and therefore there was occasion to take fresh hold of the covenant, which continues firm between Christ and believers, notwithstanding their failings and his frowns, Ps. 89. 30. . 35. "I have been careless and wanting in my duty, and yet I am my Beloved's;" for every transgression in the covenant does not throw us out of covenant. "He has justly hid his face from me and denied me his comforts, and yet my Beloved is mine;" for rebukes and chastenings are not only consistent with, but they flow from, covenant-love. (3.) When we want a full assurance of Christ's love, we must live by a faithful adherence to him; "Though I have not the sensible consolation I used to have, yet I will cleave to this, Christ is mine, and I am his." (4.) Though she had said the same before, yet now she inverts the order, and asserts his interest in her first; I am my Beloved's, entirely devoted and dedicated to him; and then her interest in him and in his grace; "My Beloved is mine, and I am happy, truly happy, in him." If our own hearts can but witness for us that we are his, there is no room left to question his being our's; for the covenant never breaks on his side. (5.) It is now her comfort, as it was then, that he feeds among the lilies, that he takes delight in his people, and converses freely with them, as we do with those with whom we feed; and therefore, though, at present, he be withdrawn, I shall meet with him again; I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

4. Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah, comely as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners. 5. Turn away thine eyes from me, for they have overcome me: thy hair is as a flock of goats that appear from Gilead. 6. Thy teeth are as a flock of sheep which go up from the washing, whereof every one beareth twins, and there is not one barren among them. 7. As a piece of a pomegranate are thy temples within thy locks. 8. There are threescore queens, and fourscore concubines, and virgins without number. 9. My dove, my undefiled is but one; she is the only one of her mother, she is the choice one of her that bare her. The daughters saw her, and blessed her; yea, the queens and the concubines, and they praised her. 10. Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?

Now we must suppose Christ graciously returned to his spouse, from whom he had withdrawn himself, returned to converse with her, for he speaks to her, and makes her to hear joy and gladness; returned to favour her, having forgiven and forgotten all her unkindnesses, for he speaks very tenderly and respectfully to her.

I. He pronounces her truly amiable; (v. 4.) Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah, a city in the tribe of Manasseh, whose name signifies pleasant, or acceptable; the situation, no doubt, being very happy, and the buildings fine and uniform. Thou art comely as Jerusalem, a city compact together, (Ps. 122. 3.) and which Solomon had built and beautified, the joy of the whole earth; it was an honour to the world, (whether they thought so or no,) that there was such a city in it. It was the holy city, and that was the greatest beauty of it; and fitly is the church compared to it, for it was figured and typified by it. The gospel-church is the Jerusalem that is above, (Gal. 4. 26.) the heavenly Jerusalem; (Heb. 12. 22.) in it God has his sanctuary, and is, in a special manner, present; thence he has the tribute of praise issuing; it is his rest for ever, and therefore it is comely as Jerusalem, and, being so, is terrible as an army with banners. Church-censures, duly administered, strike an awe upon men's consciences; the word (the weapons of her warfare) cast down imaginations, (2 Cor. 10. 5.) and even an unbeliever is convinced and judged by the solemnity of holy ordinances, 1 Cor. 14. 24, 25. The saints by faith overcome the world; (1 John, 5. 4.) nay, like Jacob, they have power with God, and prevail, Gen. 32. 23.

II. He owns himself in love with her, v. 5. Though, for a small moment, and in a little wrath, he had hid his face from her, yet now he gathers her with very surprising instances of everlasting loving-kindness, Isa. 54. 8. Turn thine eyes toward me; so some read it; "Turn the eyes of faith and love toward me, for they have lifted me up; look unto me, and be comforted." When we are calling to God to turn the eye of his favour towards us, he is calling to us to turn the eye of our obedience toward him. We read it as a strange expression of love, "Turn away thine eyes from me, for I cannot bear the brightness of them, they have quite overcome me, and I am prevailed with to overlook all that is past;" as God said to Moses, when he interceded for Israel, "Let me alone, or I must yield," Exod. 32. 10. Christ is pleased to borrow these expressions of a passionate lover, only to express the tenderness of a compassionate Redeemer, and the delight he takes in his redeemed, and in the workings of his own grace in them.

III. He repeats, almost word for word, part of the description he had given of her beauty, (ch. 4. 1. . 3.) her hair, her teeth, her temples; (v. 5. . 7.) not because he could not have described it in other words, and by other similitudes, but to shew that he had still the same esteem for her, since her unkindness to him, and his withdrawals from her, that he had before; lest she should think, that, though he would not quite cast her off, yet he would think the worse of her while he knew her, he says the same of her now, that he had done, for those to whom much is forgiven, will love the more, and, consequently, will be the more beloved, for Christ has said, I love those that love me. He is pleased with his people, notwithstanding their weaknesses, when they sincerely repent of them, and return to their duty, and commends them as if they were already arrived at perfection.

IV. He prefers her before all her competitors, and sees all the beauties and perfections of others meeting and centering in her; (v. 8, 9.) "There are, it may be, threescore queens, who, like Esther, have by their beauty attained to the royal state and dignity, and fourscore concubines, whom kings have preferred before their own queens, as more charming, and these attended by their maids of honour, virgins without number, who, when there is a ball at court, appear in great splendour, with beauty that dazzles the eyes of the spectators; but my dove, my undefiled, is but one, a holy one."

1. She excels them all. Go through all the world, and view the societies of men that reckon themselves wise and happy, kingdoms, courts, senates, councils, or whatever incorporations you may think valuable, they are none of them to be compared with the church of Christ; their honours and beauties are nothing to her's. Who is like unto thee, O Israel? Deut. 33. 29.—4. 6, 7.

There are particular persons, as virgins without number, who are famed for their accomplishments, the beauties of their address, language, and performances, but the beauty of holiness is beyond all other beauty; "My dove, my undefiled, is one, has that one beauty, that she is a dove, an undefiled dove, and nine, and that makes her excel the queens and virgins, though they were ever so many."

2. She includes them all; "Other kings have many queens, and concubines, and virgins, with whose conversation they entertain themselves, but my dove, my undefiled, is to me instead of all; in that one I have more than they have in all their's." Or,

"Though there are many particular churches, some of great dignity, others of less, some of longer, others of shorter, standing, and many particular believers, of different gifts and attainments, some more eminent, others less so, yet they all constitute but one catholic church, are all but parts of that whole, and that is my dove, my undefiled." Christ is the Centre of the church's unity; all the children of God, that are scattered abroad, are gathered by him, (John, 11. 52.) and meet in him, (Eph. 1. 10.) and are all his doves.

V. He shews how much she was esteemed, not by him only, but by all that had acquaintance with her, and stood in relation to her. It would add to her praise to say, 1. That she was her mother's darling; she had that in her, from a child, which recommended her to the particular affection of her parents; as Solomon himself is said to have been tender, and an only one in the sight of his mother, (Prov. 4. 3.) so was she the only one of her mother, as dear as if she had been an only one; and if there were many more, yet she was the choice one of her that bare her; more excellent than all the societies of men this world ever produced. All the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, are nothing, in Christ's account, compared with the church, which is made up of the excellent ones of the earth, the precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, and more excellent than their neighbours. 2. That she was admired by all her acquaintance, not only the daughters, who were her juniors, but even the queen and the concubines, who might have reason to be jealous of her as a rival; they all blessed her, and wished well to her, praised her, and spake well of her; the daughters of Jerusalem called her the fairest among women; all agreed to give her the pre-eminence for beauty, and every sheaf bowed to her's. Note, (1.) Those that have any sense of things, cannot but be convinced in their consciences, (whatever they say,) that godly people are excellent people: many will give them their good word, and more, their good will. (2.) Jesus Christ takes notice what people think and speak of his church, and is well-pleased with them that honour such as fear the Lord, and takes it ill of those that despise them, particularly when they are under a cloud, that offend any of his little ones.

VI. He produces the encomium that was given of her, and makes it his own; (v. 10.) Who is she that looks forth as the morning? This is applicable both to the church in the world, and to grace in the heart.

1. They are amiable as the light, the most beautiful of all visible things; Christians are, or should be, the lights of the world. The patriarchal church looked forth as the morning, when the promise of the Messiah was first made known, and the day-spring from on high visited this dark world. The Jewish church was fair as the moon; the ceremonial law was an imperfect light, it shone by reflection, it was changing as the moon, did not make day, nor was the Sun of righteousness yet risen; but the Christian church is clear as the sun, exhibits a great light to them that sit in darkness. Or, we may apply it to the kingdom of grace, the gospel-kingdom. (1.) In its rise, it looks forth as the morning after a dark night; it is discovering, (Job, 38. 12, 13.) and very acceptable, looks forth pleasantly as a clear morning; but it is small in its beginnings, and scarcely perceptible at first. (2.) It is, at the best, in this world, but fair as the moon, which shines with a borrowed light, which has her changes and eclipses, and her spots too, and, when at the full, does but rule by night. But, (3.) When it is perfected in the kingdom of glory, then it will be clear as the sun, the church clothed with the sun, with Christ the Sun of righteousness, Rev. 12. 1. They that love God will then be as the sun when he goes forth in his strength; (Judg. 5. 31. Matth. 13. 43.) they shall shine in inexpressible glory, and that which is perfect will then come; there shall be no darkness, no spots, Isa. 30. 26.

2. The beauty of the church and of believers, is not only amiable, but awful as an army with banners. The church, in this world, is as an army, as the camp of Israel in the wilderness; its state is militant; it is in the midst of enemies, and is engaged in a constant conflict with them. Believers are soldiers in this army. It has its banners; the gospel of Christ is an ensign, (Isa.

11. 12.) the love of Christ, ch. 2. 4. It is marshalled, and kept in order and under discipline; it is terrible to its enemies, as Israel in the wilderness was, Exod. 15. 14. When Balaam saw Israel encamped according to their tribes, by their standards, with colours displayed, he said, How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob! Numb. 24. 5. When the church preserves her purity, she secures her honour and victory; when she is fair as the moon, and clear as the sun, she is truly great and formidable.

11. I went down into the garden of nuts, to see the fruits of the valley, and to see whether the vine flourished, and the pomegranates budded. 12. Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Ammi-nadib. 11. Return, return, O Shulamite; return, return, that we may look upon thee. What will ye see in the Shulamite? As it were the company of two armies.

Christ being now returned to his spouse, and the breach being entirely made up, and the falling out of these lovers being the renewing of love, Christ here gives an account both of the distance and of the reconciliation.

1. That when he was withdrawn from his church as his spouse, and did not comfort her, yet even then he had his eye upon it as his garden, which he took care of; (v. 11.) "I went down into the garden of nuts, or nutmegs, to see the fruits of the valley, with complacency and concern, to see them as my own." When he was out of sight, he was no farther off than the garden, hid among the trees of the garden, in a low and dark valley; but then he was observing how the vine flourished, that he might do all that to it which was necessary to promote its flourishing, and might delight himself in it as a man does in a fruitful garden. He went to see whether the pomegranates budded. Christ observes the first beginnings of the good work of grace in the soul, and the early buddings of devout affections and inclinations there; and is well-pleased with them, as we are with the blossoms of the spring.

2. That yet he could not long content himself with this, but suddenly felt a powerful, irresistible, inclination in his own bosom to return to his church, as his spouse, being moved with her lamentations after him, and her languishing desire toward him; (v. 12.) "Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Ammi-nadib; I could not any longer keep at a distance, my repentings were kindled together, and I presently resolved to fly back to the arms of my love, my dove." Thus Joseph made himself strange to his brethren, for a while, to chastise them for their former unkindnesses, and make trial of their present temper, till he could no longer refrain himself, but, or ever he was aware, burst out into tears, and said, I am Joseph, Gen. 45. 1, 3. And now the spouse perceives, as David did, (Ps. 31. 22.) that though she said in her haste I am cut off from before thine eyes, yet, at the same time, he heard the voice of her supplications, and became like the chariots of Ammi-nadib, which were noted for their beauty and swiftness. My soul put me in the chariots of my willing people; so some read it; "the chariots of their faith and hope, and love, their desires, and prayers, and expectations, which they sent after me, to fetch me back, as chariots of fire, with horses of fire." Note, (1.) Christ's people are, and ought to be, a willing people. (2.) If they continue seeking Christ, and longing after him, even when he seems to withdraw from them, he will graciously return to them in due time, perhaps sooner than they think, and with a pleasing surprise. No chariots sent for Christ shall return empty. (5.) All Christ's gracious returns to his people take rise from himself. It is not they, it is his own soul, that puts him into the chariots of his people; for he is gracious because he will be gracious, and loves his Israel because he would love them; not for their sakes, be it known to them.

3. That he, being returned to her, kindly courted her return to him, notwithstanding the discouragements she laboured under. Let her not despair of obtaining as much comfort as ever she had, before this distance happened, but take the comfort of the return of her Beloved, v. 13. Here,

(1.) The church is called the Shulamite, referring either to Solomon, the bridegroom in type, by whose name she is called, in token of her relation to him, and union with him; thus believers are called Christians from Christ; or referring to Salem, the place of her birth and residence, as the woman of Shunem is called the Shunamite. Heaven is the Salem whence the saints have their birth, and where they have their citizenship; those that belong to Christ, and are bound for heaven, shall be called Shulamites.

(2.) She is invited to return, and the invitation most earnestly pressed; Return, return; and again, "Return, return; recover the peace thou hast lost and forfeited; come back to thy former composedness and cheerfulness of spirit." Note, Good Christians, after they have had their comfort disturbed, are sometimes hard to be pacified, and need to be earnestly persuaded to return again to their rest. As revolting sinners have need to be called to again and again, (Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?) so disquieted saints have need to be called to again and again, Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye droop? why art thou cast down, O my soul?

(3.) Being returned, she is desired to shew her face, That we may look upon thee. Go no longer with thy face covered like a mourner. Let those that have made their peace with God, lift up their faces without spot; (Job. 22. 26.) let them come boldly to his throne of grace. Christ is pleased with the cheerfulness and humble confidence of his people, and would have them look pleasant. Let us look upon thee, not I only, but the holy angels, who rejoice in the consolation of saints, as well as in the conversion of sinners: not I only, but all the daughters." Christ and believers are pleased with the beauty of the church.

(4.) A short account is given of what is to be seen in her. The question is asked, What will ye see in the Shulamite? And it is answered, As it were the company of two armies.

[1.] Some think she gives this account of herself; she is shy of appearing, unwilling to be looked upon, having, in her own account, no form or comeliness. Alas! says she, What will you see in the Shulamite? Nothing that is worth your looking upon; nothing but as it were the company of two armies actually engaged, where nothing is to be seen but blood and slaughter. The watchmen had smitten her, and wounded her, and she carried in her face the marks of those wounds, looked as if she had been fighting. She had said, (ch. 1. 6.) Look not upon me, because I am black; here she says, "Look not upon me, because I am bloody." Or, it may denote the constant struggle that is between grace and corruption in the souls of believers; they are in them as two armies continually skirmishing, which makes her ashamed to shew her face.

[2.] Others think her Beloved gives this account of her. "I will tell you what you shall see in the Shulamite; you shall see as noble a sight as that of two armies, or two parts of the same army, drawn out in rank and file; not only as an army with banners, but as two armies, with a majesty double to what was before spoken: she is as Mahanaim, as the two hosts which Jacob saw, (Gen. 32. 1, 2.) a host of saints, and a host of angels ministering to them; the church militant, the church triumphant." Behold two armies; in both the church appears beautiful.

CHAP. VII.

In this chapter, I. Christ, the royal Bridegroom, goes on to describe the beauties of his spouse, the church, in many instances, and to express his love to her, and the delight he has in her conversation, v. 1. 9. II. The spouse, the church, expresses her great delight in him, and the desire that she had of communion and fellowship with him, v. 10. 13. Such mutual esteem and endearment are there between Christ and believers! And what is heaven but an everlasting interchanging of loves between the holy God and holy souls!

1. HOW beautiful are thy feet with shoes, O prince's daughter! The joints of thy thighs are like jewels, the work of the hands of a cunning workman. 2. Thy navel is like a round goblet, which wanteth not liquor: thy belly is like an heap of wheat set about with lilies. 3. Thy two breasts are like two young roes that are twins. 4. Thy neck is as a tower of ivory; thine eyes like the fish-pools in Heshbon, by the gate of Bath-rabbim: thy nose is as the tower of Lebanon which looketh toward Damascus. 5. Thine head upon thee is like Carmel, and the hair of thine head like purple; the king is held in the galleries. 6. How fair and how pleasant art thou, O love, for delights! 7. This thy stature is like to a palm-tree, and thy breasts to clusters of grapes. 8. I said, I will go up to the palm-tree, I will take hold of the boughs thereof: now also thy breasts shall be as clusters of the vine, and the smell of thy nose like apples; 9. And the roof of thy mouth like the best wine, for my beloved, that goeth down sweetly, causing the lips of those that are asleep to speak.

The title which Jesus Christ here gives to the church is new, O prince's daughter, agreeing with Ps. 45. 13. where she is called the king's daughter. She is so, in respect of her new birth, born from above, begotten of God, and his workmanship, bearing the image of the King of kings, and guided by his Spirit. She is so by marriage; Christ, by betrothing her to himself, though he found her mean and despicable, has made her a prince's daughter; she has a princely disposition, something in her truly noble and generous; she is daughter and heir to the prince of the kings of the earth; if children, then heirs.

Now here we have,

I. A large description of the beauty of the spouse, which, some think, is given by the virgins her companions, and that those were they who called upon her to return; it seems rather to be given by Christ himself, and that it is designed to express his love to her, and delight in her, as before, ch. 4. 1, &c. and ch. 6. 5, 6. The similitudes are here different from what they were before, to shew that the beauty of holiness is such as nothing in nature can reach; you may still say more of it, and yet still come short of it. That commendation of the spouse, ch. 4. was immediately upon the espousals; (ch. 3. 11.) this, upon her return from a by-path; (ch. 6. 13.) yet this exceeds that, to shew the constancy of Christ's love to his people; he loves them to the end, since he made them precious in his sight, and honourable. The spouse had described the beauty of her Beloved in ten particulars; (ch. 5. 11, &c.) and now he describes her in as many, for he will not be behind-hand with her in respects and endearments. Those that honour Christ he will certainly honour, and make honourable. As the prophet, in describing the corruptions of degenerate Israel, reckons from the sale of the foot even unto the head, (Isa. 1. 6.) so here the beauties of the church are reckoned from foot to head, that, as the apostle speaks, when he is comparing the church, as here, to the natural body, (1 Cor. 12. 23.) more abundant honour might be bestowed on those parts of the body, which we think to be less honourable, and which therefore lacked honour, v. 24.

1. Her feet are here praised; the feet of Christ's ministers are beautiful in the eyes of the church, (Isa. 52. 7.) and her feet are here said to be beautiful in the eyes of Christ; How beautiful are thy feet with shoes! When believers, being made free from the captivity of sin, (Acts, 12. 8.) stand fast in the liberty with which they are made free, preserve the tokens of their enfranchisement, have their feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace, and walk steadily according to the rule of the gospel, then their feet are beautiful with shoes, they tread firm, being well-armed against the troubles they meet with in their way. When we rest not in good affections, but they are accompanied with sincere endeavours and resolutions, then our feet are beautified with shoes. See Ezek. 16. 10.

2. The joints of the thighs are here said to be like jewels, and those curiously wrought by a cunning workman. This is explained by Eph. 4. 16. and Col. 2. 19. where the mystical body of Christ is said to be held together by joints and bands, as the hips and knees (both which are the joints of the thighs) serve the natural body in its strength and motion. The church is then comely in Christ's eyes, when those joints are kept firm by holy love and unity, and the communion of saints. When believers act in religion from good principles, and are steady and regular in their whole conversation, and turn themselves easily to every duty in its time and place, then the joints are like jewels.

3. The navel is here compared to a round cup or goblet, that wants not any of the agreeable liquor that one would wish to find in it, such as David's cup that ran over, (Ps. 23. 5.) well-shaped, and not as that miserable infant whose navel was not cut, Ezek. 16. 4. The fear of the Lord is said to be health to the navel. See Prov. 3. 8. When the soul wants not that fear, then the navel wants not liquor.

4. The belly is like a heap of wheat in the store-chamber, which perhaps was sometimes, to make shew, adorned with flowers. The wheat is useful, the lilies beautiful; there is every thing in the church, which may be to the members of that body either for use or for ornament. All the body is nourished from the belly; it denotes the spiritual prosperity of a believer, and the healthful constitution of the soul, all in good plight.

5. The breasts are like two young roes that are twins, v. 3. By the breasts of the church's consolations those are nourished who are born from its belly, (Isa. 46. 3.) and by the navel received nourishment in the womb. This comparison we had before, ch. 4. 5.

6. The neck, which before was compared to the tower of David, (ch. 4. 4.) is here compared to a tower of ivory, so white, so precious; such is the faith of the saints, by which they are joined to Christ their Head. The name of the Lord, improved by faith, is to the saints as a strong and impregnable tower.

7. The eyes are likened to the fish-pools in Heshbon, or the artificial fish-ponds, by a gate, either of Jerusalem, or of Heshbon, which is called Bath-rabbim, the daughter of a multitude, because a great thoroughfare. The understanding, the intentions of a believer, are clean and clear as these ponds. The eyes, weeping for sin, are as fountains, (Jer. 9. 1.) and comely with Christ.

8. The nose like the tower of Lebanon, the forehead or face set like a flint, (Isa. 50. 7.) undaunted as that tower was impregnable. So it denotes the magnanimity and holy bravery of the church, or, as others, a spiritual sagacity to discern things that differ, as animals strangely distinguish by the smell. This tower looks toward Damascus, the head city of Syria, denoting the boldness of the church, in facing its enemies, and not fearing them.

9. The head like Carmel, a very high hill near the sea, v. 5. The head of a believer is lifted up above his enemies, (Ps. 27. 6.) above the storms of the lower region, as the top of Carmel was, pointing heaven-ward. The more we get above this world, and the nearer to heaven, and the more secure and serene we become by that means, the more amiable we are in the eyes of the Lord Jesus.

10. The hair of the head is said to be like purple. This denotes the universal amiableness of a believer in the eyes of Christ, even to the hair, or, as some understand it, the pins with which the hair is dressed. Some by the head and the hair understand the governors of the church, who, if they be careful to do their duty, add much to her comeliness. The head like crimson, (so some read it,) and the hair like purple, the two colours worn by great men.

II. The complacency which Christ takes in his church thus beautified and adorned; she is lovely indeed, if she be so in his eyes; as he puts the comeliness upon her, so it is his love that makes this comeliness truly valuable; for he is an unexceptionable Judge.

1. He delighted to look upon his church, and to converse with it, rejoicing in that habitable part of his earth; the King is held in the galleries, and cannot leave them. This is explained by Ps. 132. 13, 14. The Lord has chosen Zion, saying, This is my rest for ever, here will I dwell; and Ps. 147. 11. The Lord takes plea-me in those that fear him. And if Christ has such delight in the galleries of communion with his people, much more reason have they to delight in them, and to reckon a day there better than a thousand.

2. He was even struck with admiration at the beauty of his church; (v. 6.) How fair and how pleasant art thou, O love! How art thou made fair! So the word is; "not born so, but made so with the comeliness which I have put upon thee. Holiness is a beauty beyond expression; the Lord Jesus is wonderfully pleased with it: the outward aspect of it is fair, the inward disposition of it is pleasant and highly agreeable, and the complacency he has in it is inexpressible; O my dearest for delights; so some read it.

3. He determined to keep up communion with his church.

(1.) To take hold of her as of the boughs of a palm-tree. He compares her stature to a palm tree; (v. 7.) so straight, so strong, does she appear, when she is looked upon in her full proportion. The palm-tree is observed to flourish most when it is loaded; so the church, the more it has been afflicted, the more it has multiplied, and the branches of it are emblems of victory. Christ says, "I will go up to the palm-tree, to entertain myself with the shadow of it, (v. 8.) and I will take hold of its boughs, and observe the beauty of them." What Christ has said, he will do, in favour to his people; we may be sure he will do it, for his kind purposes are never suffered to fall to the ground; and if he take hold of the boughs of his church, take early hold of her branches, when they are young and tender, he will keep his hold, and not let them go.

(2.) To refresh himself with her fruits. He compares her breasts (her pious affections toward him) to clusters of grapes, a most pleasant fruit; (v. 7.) and he repeats it; (v. 8.) They shall be, they shall be to me, as clusters of the vine, which make glad the heart. "Now that I come up to the palm-tree, now thy graces shall be exerted and excited." Christ's presence with his people kindles the holy heavenly fire in their souls, and then their breasts shall be as clusters of the vine, a cordial to themselves, and acceptable to him. And since God, at first, breathed into men's nostrils the breath of life, and breathes the breath of the new life still, the smell of their nostrils is like the smell of apples, or oranges, which is pleasing and reviving. The Lord smelled a sweet savour from Noah's sacrifice, Gen. 8. 21. And, lastly, the roof of her mouth is like the best wine; (v. 9.) her spiritual taste and relish, or the words she speaks to God and man, which come not from the teeth outward, but from the roof of the mouth, these are pleasing to God; the prayer of the upright is his delight. And when those that fear the Lord speak one to another as becomes them, the Lord hearkens and hears with pleasure, Mal. 3. 16. It is like that wine which is, [1.] Very palatable and grateful to the taste; it goes down sweetly, it goes straightly; so the margin reads it; it moves itself aright, Prov. 23. 31. The pleasures of sense seem right to the carnal appetite, and go down smoothly, but they are often wrong, and, compared with the pleasure of communion with God, they are harsh and rough; nothing goes down so sweetly with a gracious soul, as the wine of God's consolations. [2.] It is a great cordial; the presence of Christ by his Spirit with his people shall be reviving and refreshing to them, as that strong wine which makes the lips even of those that are asleep, (that are ready to faint away in a deliquium,) to speak. Unconverted sinners are asleep, saints are often drowsy, and listless, and half asleep; but the word and Spirit of Christ will put life and vigour into the soul, and out of the abundance of the heart that is thus filled, the mouth will speak. When the apostles were filled with the Spirit, they spake with tongues the wonderful works of God; (Acts, 2. 10. 12.) and they who, in opposition to being drunk with wine, wherein is excess, are filled with the Spirit, speak to themselves in psalms and hymns, Eph. 5. 18, 19. When Christ is thus commending the sweetness of his spouse's love, excited by the manifestation of his, she seems to put in that word, for my Beloved, as in a parenthesis. "Is there anything in me that is pleasant or valuable? As it is from, so it is for my Beloved." Then he delights in our good affections and services, when they are all for him, and devoted to his glory.

10. I am my beloved's, and his desire is towards me. 11. Come, my beloved, let us go forth into the field; let us lodge in the villages. 12. Let us get up early to the vineyards; let us see if the vine flourish, whether the tender grape appear, and the pomegranates bud forth: there will I give thee my loves. 13. The mandrakes give a smell, and at our gates are all manner of pleasant fruits, new and old, which I have laid up for thee, O my beloved.

These are the words of the spouse, the church, the believing soul, in answer to the kind expressions of Christ's love in the foregoing verses.

1. She here triumphs in her relation to Christ, and her interest in him, and in his name will she boast all the day long. With what a transport of joy and holy exultation does she say, (v. 10.) "I am my Beloved's, not my own, but entirely devoted to him, and owned by him." If we can truly say that Christ is our best Beloved, we may be confident that we are his, and he will save us, Ps. 119. 94. The gracious discoveries of Christ's love to us should engage us greatly to rejoice in the hold he has of us, his sovereignty over us, and propriety in us; which is no less a spring of comfort than a bond of duty. Intimacy of communion with Christ should help to clear up our interest in him.

Glorying in this, that she is his, to serve him, and reckoning that her honour, she comforts herself with this, that his desire is toward her, that is, he is her Husband; it is a periphrasis of the conjugal relation, Gen. 3. 16. Christ's desire was strongly toward his chosen remnant, when he came from heaven to earth to seek and save them; and when, in pursuance of his undertaking, he was even straitened till the baptism of blood he was to pass through for them was accomplished, Luke, 12. 50. He desired Zion for a habitation; this is a comfort to believers, that, whosoever slights them, Christ has a desire toward them, such a desire as will again bring him from heaven to earth, to receive them to himself; for he longs to have them all with him, John, 17. 24.—14. 3.

II. She humbly and earnestly desires communion with him; (v. 11, 12.) "Come, my Beloved, let us take a walk together, that I may receive counsel, instruction, and comfort, from thee, and may make known my wants and grievances to thee, with freedom, and without interruption." Thus Christ walked with the two disciples that were going to the village called Emmaus, and talked with them, till he made their hearts burn within them. Observe here

1. Having received fresh tokens of his love, and full assurances of her interest in him, she presses forward toward further acquaintance with him; as blessed Paul, who desired yet more and more of the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, Phil. 3. 8. Christ has made it appear how much his desire is towards us, and we are very ungrateful, if our's be not toward him. Note, Communion with Christ is that which all that are sanctified earnestly breathe after; and the clearer discoveries he makes them of his love, the more earnestly do they desire it. Sensual pleasures pall the carnal appetite, and soon give it a surfeit, but spiritual delights whet the desires, whose language is, Nothing more than God, but still more and more of him. Christ had said, I will go up to the palm-tree; Come, saith she, Let us go. The promises Christ has made us of communion with him are not to supersede, but quicken and encourage, our prayers for that communion.

2. She desires to go forth into the fields and villages, to have this communion with him. Those that would converse with Christ must go forth from the world, and the amusements of it, must avoid every thing that would divert the mind and be a hindrance to it, when it should be wholly taken up with Christ; we must contrive how to attend upon the Lord without distraction, (1 Cor. 7. 35.) for therefore the spouse here covets to get out of the noise of the town. Let us go forth to him without the camp, Heb. 14. 13. Solitude and retirement befriended communion with God: therefore Isaac went out into the field to meditate and pray.

SOLOMON'S SONG, VII, VIII. The Love of the Church to Christ.

Enter into thy closet, and shut thy door. A believer is never less alone than when alone with Christ, where no eye sees.

(3.) Having business to go abroad, to look after the grounds, she desires the company of her Beloved. Note, Wherever we are, we may keep up our communion with God, if it be not our own fault, for he is always at our right-hand, his eye always upon us, and both his word and his ear always nigh us. By going about our worldly affairs with heavenly holy hearts, mixing pious thoughts with common actions, and having our eyes ever toward the Lord, we may take Christ along with us whithersoever we go. Nor should we go any whither, where we cannot in faith ask him to go along with us.

(4.) She is willing to rise betimes, to go along with her Beloved; Let us get up early to the vineyards; it intimates her care to improve opportunities of conversing with her Beloved; when the time appointed is come, we must lose no time, but, as the woman, (Mark, 16. 2.) go very early, though it be to a sepulchre, if we be in hopes to meet him there. Those that will go abroad with Christ, must begin betimes with him, early in the morning of their days; must begin every day with him, seek him early, seek him diligently.

(5.) She will be content to take up her lodging in the villages, the huts or cottages which the country people built for their shelter, when they attended their business in the fields; there, in these mean and cold dwellings, she will gladly reside, if she may but have her Beloved with her; his presence will make them fine and pleasant, and convert them into palaces. A gracious soul can reconcile itself to the poorest accommodations, if it may have communion with God in them.

(6.) The most pleasant delightful fields, even in the spring-time, when the country is most pleasant, will not satisfy her, unless she have her Beloved with her. No delights on earth can make a believer easy, unless he enjoy God in all.

3. She desires to be better acquainted with the state of her own soul, and the present posture of its affairs; (v. 12.) Let us see if the vine flourish. Our own souls are our vineyards; they are, or should be, planted with vines and pomegranates, choice and useful trees; we are made keepers of these vineyards, and therefore are concerned often to look into them, to examine the state of our own souls; to see whether the vine flourishes, whether our graces be in act and exercise, whether we be fruitful in the fruits of righteousness, and whether our fruit abound. And especially let us inquire whether the tender grapes appear, and whether the pomegranates bud forth, what good motions and dispositions there are in us, that are yet but young and tender, that they may be protected and cherished with a particular care, and may not be nipped, or blasted, or rubbed off, but cultivated, that they may bring forth fruit unto perfection. In this inquiry into our own spiritual state, it will be good to take Christ along with us; because his presence will make the vine flourish, and the tender grape appear, as the returning sun revives the gardens; and because to him we are concerned to approve ourselves; if he sees the vine flourish, and the tender grape appear; if we can appeal to him, Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee; if his Spirit witness with our spirit, that our souls prosper, it is enough. And if we would be acquainted with ourselves, we must beg of him to search and try us, to help us in the search, and discover us to ourselves.

4. She promises to her Beloved the best entertainment she can give him at her country-seat; for he will come in to us, and sup with us, Rev. 3. 20.

(1.) She promises him her best affections; and, whatever else she had for him, it would utterly be contemned, if her heart were not entire for him; "There therefore will I give thee my loves; I will repeat the professions of it, honour thee with the tokens of it; and the outgoings of my soul toward thee, in adorations and desires, shall be quickened and enlarged, and my heart offered up to thee in a holy fire."

(2.) She promises him her best provision, v. 13. There we shall find pleasant odours, for the mandrakes give a smell; the love-flowers or lovely ones, so the word signifies, or the love fruits; it was something that was in all respects very grateful, so valuable, that

Rachel and Leah had like to have fallen out about it, Gen. 30. 14. We shall also find that which is good for food, as well as pleasant to the eye, all the rarities that the country affords; At our gates are all manner of pleasant fruits. Note, (1.) The fruits and exercises of grace are pleasant to the Lord Jesus. Note, [2.] These must be carefully laid up for him, devoted to his service and honour, must be always ready to us when we have occasion for them, as that is which is laid up at our gates; that, by our bringing forth much fruit, he may be glorified, John, 15. 18. Note, [3.] There is a great variety of these pleasant fruits, with which our souls should be well stocked; we must have all sorts of them, grace for all occasions, new and old, as the good householder has in his treasury; not only the products of this year, but remainders of the last, Matth. 13. 52. We must not only have that ready to us, for the service of Christ, which we have heard, and learned, and experienced, lately, but must retain that which we have formerly gathered; nor must we content ourselves only with what we have laid up in store, in the days of old, but, as long as we live, must be still adding something new to it, that our stock may increase, and we may be thoroughly furnished for every good work. Note, [4.] Those that truly love Christ will think all they have, even their most pleasant fruits, and what they have treasured up most carefully, too little to be bestowed upon him, and he is welcome to it all; if it were more and better, it should be at his service. It is all from him, and therefore it is fit it should be all for him.

CHAP. VIII.

The affections between Christ and his spouse are as strong and lively here, in this closing chapter of the song, as ever, and rather more so. I. The spouse continues her importunity for a more intimate communion and fellowship with him, v. 1. 3. II. She charges the daughters of Jerusalem not to interrupt her communion with her Beloved; (v. 4.) and they, thereupon, admire her dependence on him, v. 5. III. She begs of her Beloved, whom she raises up by her prayers, (v. 5.) that he would by his grace confirm that blessed union with him, to which she was admitted, v. 6, 7. IV. She makes intercession for others also, that care might be taken of them, (v. 8, 9.) and pleases herself with the thoughts of her own interest in Christ, and his affection to her, v. 10. V. She owns herself his tenant for a vineyard she held of him at Bael-hamon, v. 11, 12. VI. The song concludes with an interchanging of parting requests. Christ charges his spouse that she should often let him hear from her; (v. 13.) and she begs of him that he would hasten his return to her, v. 14.

1. O THAT thou wert as my brother, that sucked the breasts of my mother! When I should find thee without, I would kiss thee; yea, I should not be despised. 2. I would lead thee, and bring thee into my mother's house, who would instruct me: I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine of the juice of my pomegranate. 3. His left hand should be under my head, and his right hand should embrace me. 4. I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, until he please.

Here, 1. The spouse wishes for a constant intimacy and freedom with the Lord Jesus. She was already betrothed to him, but, the nuptials being not yet solemnized and published, (the bride, the Lamb's wife, will not be completely ready till his second coming,) she was obliged to be shy, and to keep at some distance; she therefore wishes she may be taken for his sister, he having called her so, (ch. 5. 1.) and that she might have the same chaste and innocent familiarity with him that a sister has with a brother, an own brother, that sucked the breasts of the same mother with her, who would therefore be exceeding tender of her, as Joseph was of his brother Benjamin. Some make this to be the prayer of the Old-Testament saints for the hastening of Christ's incarnation, that the church might be the better acquainted with him, when, forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he should also himself likewise take part of the same, and not be ashamed to call them brethren. It is rather the wish of all believers for a more intimate communion with him, that they might receive the Spirit of sanctification, and so Christ might be as their Brother, that they might be as his brethren, which then they are, when by grace they are made partakers of a divine nature, and he that sanctifies, and they that are sanctified, are both of one, Heb. 2. 11, &c. It becomes brethren and sisters, the children of the same parents, that have been nursed at the same breast, to be very loving to, and tender of, one another; such a love the spouse desires might be between her and her Beloved, that she might call him brother.

2. She promises herself then the satisfaction of making a more open profession of her relation to him, than at present she could make; "When I should find thee without, any where, even before company, I would kiss thee, as a sister does her own brother, especially her little brother that is now sucking the breasts of her mother;" for so some understand it; "I would use all the decent freedom with thee that could be, and should not be despised for it, as doing any thing unbecoming the modesty of my sex." The church, since Christ's incarnation, can better own him than she could before, when she would have been laughed at for being so much in love with one that was not yet born. Christ is become as our Brother; wherever we find him, therefore let us be ready to own our relation to him, and affection for him, and not fear being despised for it, nor regard that any more than David did, when he danced before the ark; If this be to be vile, I will be yet more vile. Nay, let us hope that we shall not be despised so much as some imagine; Of the maid-servants of whom thou hast spoken I shall be had in honour. Wherever we find the image of Christ, though it be without, among those that do not follow him with us, we must love it, and testify that love, and we shall not be despised for it, but catholic charity will gain us respect.

3. She promises to improve the opportunity she should then have for cultivating an acquaintance with him; (v. 2.) "I would lead thee, as my brother, by the arm, and hang upon thee; I would shew thee all the house of my precious things, would bring thee into my mother's house, into the church, into the solemn assemblies, (ch. 3. 4.) into my closet;" (for there the saints have most familiar communion with Christ;) "and there thou wouldest instruct me;" (so some read it;) as brethren inform their sister of what they desire to be instructed in. Those that know Christ, shall be taught of him; and therefore we should desire communion with Christ, that we may receive instruction from him. He is come, that he might give us an understanding; or, "My mother would instruct me, when I have thee with me." It is the presence of Christ, in and with his church, that makes the word and ordinances instructive to her children, which shall all be taught of God.

4. She promises him to bid him welcome to the best she had; she would cause him to drink of her spiced wine, and the juice of her pomegranate, and bid him welcome to it, wishing it better, for his sake. The exercise of grace and the performance of duty are spiced wine to the Lord Jesus, very acceptable to him, as expressive of a grateful sense of his favours. Those that are pleased with Christ must study to be pleasing to him; and they will not find him hard to be pleased. He reckons hearty welcome his best entertainment; and if we have that, he will bring his entertainment along with him.

5. She doubts not but to experience his tender care of her, and affection to her; (v. 3.) that she should be supported by his power, and kept from fainting in the hardest services and sufferings; His left hand shall be under my head; and that she should be comforted with his love; His right hand should embrace me. Thus Christ laid his right hand upon John, when he was ready to die away, Rev. 1. 17. See also Dan. 10. 10, 18. It may be read as it is, ch. 2. 6. His left hand is under my head; for the words are the same in the original, and so it bespeaks an immediate answer to her prayer; she was answered with strength in her soul, Ps. 138. 3. While we are following hard after Christ, his right hand sustains us; (Ps. 63. 8.) underneath are the everlasting arms.

6. She charges those about her to take heed of doing any thing to interrupt the pleasing communion she now had with her Beloved, (v. 4.) as she had done before, when he thus strengthened and comforted her with his presence: (ch. 2. 7.) Let me charge you,

O ye daughters of Jerusalem, and reason with you, Why should you stir up, and why should you awake, my Love, until he will? The church, our common mother, charges all her children, that they never do any thing to provoke Christ to withdraw, which we are very prone to do. Why should you put such an affront upon him? Why should you be such enemies to yourselves? We should thus reason with ourselves when we are tempted to do that which will grieve the Spirit. "What! am I weary of Christ's presence, that I affront him, and provoke him to depart from me? Why should I do that which he will take so unkindly, and which I shall certainly repent of?"

5. Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved? I raised thee up under the apple-tree: there thy mother brought thee forth; there she brought thee forth that bare thee. 6. Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm: for love is strong as death; jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame. 7. Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it: if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, it would utterly be contemned.

Here,

I. The spouse is very much admired by those about her. It comes in a parenthesis, but in it gospel-grace lies as plain, and as much above ground, as any where in this mystical song; Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning upon her Beloved? Some make these the words of the Bridegroom, expressing himself well-pleased with her reliance on him, and resignation of herself to his guidance. They are rather the words of the daughters of Jerusalem, to whom she spake; (v. 4.) they see her, and bless her; the angels in heaven, and all her friends on earth, are the joyful spectators of her bliss. The Jewish church came up from the wilderness, supported by the divine power and favour, Deut. 32. 10, 11. The Christian church was raised up from a low and desolate condition by the grace of Christ relied on, Gal. 4. 27. Particular believers are then amiable, nay, admirable, and divine grace is to be admired in them, when by the power of divine grace they are brought up from the wilderness, leaning with a holy confidence and complacency upon Jesus Christ, their Beloved. This bespeaks the beauty of a soul, and the wonders of divine grace; 1. In the conversion of sinners. A sinful state is a wilderness, remote from communion with God, barren and dry, and in which there is no true comfort, it is a wandering wanting state; out of this wilderness we are concerned to come up, by true repentance, in the strength of the grace of Christ, supported by our Beloved, and carried in his arms. 2. In the consolation of saints. A soul convinced of sin, and truly humbled for it, is in a wilderness, quite at a loss; and there is no coming out of this wilderness, but leaning on Christ as our Beloved, by faith, and not leaning to our own understanding, nor trusting to any righteousness or strength of our own as sufficient for us, but going forth, and going on, in the strength of the Lord God, and making mention of his righteousness, even his only, who is the Lord our Righteousness. 3. In the salvation of those that belong to Christ. We must go up from the wilderness of this world, having our conversation in heaven; and, at death, we must remove thither, leaning upon Christ; must live and die by faith in him; To me to live is Christ, and it is he that is Gain in death.

II. She addresses herself to her Beloved.

1. She puts him in mind of the former experience which she and others had had of comfort and success in applying to him. (1.) For her own part; "I raised thee up under the apple-tree, I have many a time wrestled with thee by prayer, and have prevailed. When I was alone in the acts of devotion, retired in the orchard, under the apple-tree," (which Christ himself was compared to,

(ek. 2. 3.) as Nathanael under the fig-tree, (John, 1. 48.) meditating and praying, then I raised thee up, to help me and comfort me, as the disciples raised him up in the storm, saying, Master, carest thou not that we perish? (Mark, 4. 38.) and the church, (Ps. 44. 23.) Awake, why sleepest thou? Note, The experience we have had of Christ's readiness to yield to the importunities of our faith and prayer, should encourage us to continue instant in our addresses to him, to strive more earnestly, and not to faint; I sought the Lord, and he heard me, Ps. 34. 4. (2.) Others also had had like experience of comfort in Christ, as it follows there, (Ps. 34. 5.) They looked unto him, as well as I, and were lightened. There thy mother brought thee forth, the universal church, or believing souls, in whom Christ was formed, Gal. 4. 15. They were in pain for the comfort of an interest in thee, and travailed in pain with great sorrow; so the word here signifies; but they brought thee forth, the pangs did not continue always, they that had travailed in convictions, at last brought forth in consolations, and the pain was forgotten, for joy of the Saviour's birth; by this very similitude our Saviour illustrates the joy which his disciples would have in his return to them, after a mournful separation for a time, John, 16. 21, 22. After the bitter pangs of repentance, many a one has had the blessed birth of comfort; why then may not I?

2. She begs of him that her union with him might be confirmed, and her communion with him continued, and made more intimate; (v. 6.) Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm. (1.) "Let me have a place in thy heart, an interest in thy love;" this is that which all those desire above any thing, that know how much their happiness is bound up in the love of Christ. (2.) "Let me never lose the room I have in thy heart; let thy love to me be ensured, as that deed which is sealed not to be revoked, that cabinet which is sealed up, not to be robbed. Let nothing ever prevail either to separate me from thy love, or, by suspending the communications of it, to deprive me of the comfortable sense of it." (3.) "Let me be always near and dear to thee, as the signet on thy right hand, not to be parted with, (Jer. 22. 24.) engraven upon the palms of thy hand, (Isa. 49. 14.) loved with a peculiar love." (4.) "Be thou my High-Priest; let my name be written on thy breast-plate, nearer thy heart, as the names of all the tribes were engraven like the engravings of a signet, in twelve precious stones on the breast-plate of Aaron, and also on two precious stones on the two shoulders or arms of the Ephod," Exod. 28. 11, 12, 21. (5.) "Let thy power be engaged for me, as an evidence of thy love to me; let me be not only a seal upon thine heart, but a seal upon thine arm; let me be ever borne up in thine arms, and know it to my comfort." Some make these to be the words of Christ to his spouse, commanding her to be ever mindful of him, and of his love to her; however, if we desire and expect that Christ should set us as a seal on his heart, surely we cannot do less than set him as a seal on our's.

3. To enforce this petition, she pleads the power of love, or her love to him, which constrained her to be thus pressing for the tokens of his love to her.

(1.) Love is a violent vigorous passion. [1.] It is strong as death; the pains of a disappointed lover are like the pains of death; nay, the pains of death are slighted, and made nothing of, in pursuit of the beloved Object. Christ's love to us was strong as death; for it brake through death itself; he loved us, and gave himself for us. The love of true believers to Christ is strong as death, for it makes them dead to every thing else; it even parts between soul and body, while the soul, upon the wings of devout affections, soars up to heaven, and even forgets that it is yet clothed and clogged with flesh. Paul, in a rapture of this love, knew not whether he was in the body, or out of the body. By it a believer is crucified to the world. [2.] Jealousy is cruel as the grave, which swallows up and devours all; those that truly love Christ are jealous of every thing that would draw them from him, and especially jealous of themselves, lest they should do any thing to provoke him to withdraw from them, and, rather than do so, would pluck out a right eye and cut off a right hand, than which what can be more cruel? Weak and trembling saints, who conceive a jealousy of Christ, doubting of his love to them, find that jealousy to prey upon them like the grave, nothing wastes the spirits more; but it is an evidence of the strength of their love to him. [3.] The coals thereof, its lamps, and flames, and beams, are very strong, and burn with incredible fury and irresistible force, as the coals of fire that have a most vehement flame, a flame of the Lord, (so some read it,) a powerful piercing flame, as the lightning, Ps. 29. 7. Holy love is a fire that begets a vehement heat in the soul, and consumes the dross and chaff that are in it, melts it down like wax into a new form, and carries it upward as the sparks toward God and heaven.

(2.) Love is a valiant and victorious passion. Holy love is so; the reigning love of God in the soul is constant and firm, and will not be drawn off from him, either by fair means or foul, by life or death, Rom. 8. 33.

[1.] Death, and all its terrors, will not frighten a believer from loving Christ; Many waters, though they will quench fire, cannot quench this love, no, nor the floods drown it; (v. 7.) the noise of these waters will strike no terror upon it, let them do their worst, Christ shall still be the Best-Beloved. The overflowing of these waters will strike no damp upon it, but it will enable a man to rejoice in tribulation; Though he slay me, I will love him, and trust in him. No waters could quench Christ's love to us, nor any floods drown it; he waded through the greatest difficulties, even seas of blood. Love sat king upon the floods; let nothing then abate our love to him.

[2.] Life, and all its comforts, will not entice a believer from loving Christ; If a man could hire him with all the substance of his house, to take his love off from Christ, and set it upon the world and the flesh again, he would reject the proposal with the utmost disdain; as Christ, when the kingdoms of this world, and the glory of them, were offered him, to buy him off from his undertaking, said, Get thee hence, Satan; it would utterly be contemned; offer those things to those that know no better. Love will enable us to repel, and triumph over, temptations from the smiles of the world, as much as from its frowns. Some give this sense of it; If a man would give all the substance of his house to Christ, as an equivalent instead of love, to excuse it, it would be contemned. He seeks not our's, but us; the heart, not the wealth. If I give all my goods to feed the poor, and have not love, it is nothing, 1 Cor. 13. 1. Thus believers stand affected to Christ; the gifts of his providence cannot content them without the assurances of his love.

8. We have a little sister, and she hath no breasts: what shall we do for our sister in the day when she shall be spoken for? 9. If she be a wall, we will build upon her a palace of silver: and if she be a door, we will inclose her with boards of cedar. 10. I am a wall, and my breasts like towers: then was I in his eyes as one that found favour. 11. Solomon had a vineyard at Baal-hamon; he let out the vineyard unto keepers; every one for the fruit thereof was to bring a thousand pieces of silver. 12. My vineyard, which is mine, is before me: thou, O Solomon, must have a thousand, and those that keep the fruit thereof two hundred.

Christ and his spouse having sufficiently confirmed their love to each other, and agreed it to be on both sides strong as death and inviolable, they are here, in these verses, like a loving husband and his wife, consulting together about their affairs, and considering what they should do. Yoke-fellows, having laid their hearts together, lay their heads together, to contrive about their relations, and about their estates; and, accordingly, this happy pair are here advising with one another about a sister, and a vineyard.

1. They are here consulting about their sister, their little sister, and the disposing of her.

1. The spouse proposes her case with a compassionate concern; (v.8.) We have a little sister, and she has no breasts, she is not grown up to maturity; what shall we do for this little sister of our's in the day that she shall be spoken for, so as that we may do well for her?

(1.) This may be understood as spoken by the Jewish church concerning the Gentile world. God had espoused the church of the Jews to himself, and she was richly endowed, but what shall become of the poor Gentiles, the barren that has not borne, and the desolate? Isa. 54. 1. Their condition (say the pious Jews) is very deplorable and forlorn; they are sisters, children of the same fathers, God and Adam, but they are little, because not dignified with the knowledge of God; they have no breasts, no divine revelation, no scriptures, no ministers, no breasts of consolation drawn out to them, whence they might suck, being strangers to the covenants of promise; no breasts of instruction themselves to draw out to their children to nourish them, (1 Pet. 2. 2.) What shall we do for them? We can but pity them, and pray for them. Lord, what wilt thou do for them? The saints, in Solomon's time, might know, from David's psalms, that God had mercy in store for them, and they begged it might be hastened to them. Now the tables are turned, the Gentiles are betrothed to Christ, and ought to return the kindness by an equal concern for the bringing in of the Jews again, our eldest sister, that once had breasts, but now has none. If we take it in this sense, the unbelieving posterity of these pious Jews contradicted this prayer of their fathers; for when the day came that the Gentiles should be spoken for, and courted to Christ, instead of considering what to do for them, they plotted to do all they could against them, which filled up the measure of their iniquity, 1 Thess. 2. 16. Or,

(2.) It may be applied to any other that belong to the election of grace, but are yet uncalled; they are remotely related to Christ and his church, and sisters to them both; other sheep that are not of this fold, John, 10. 16. Acts, 18. 10. They have no breasts, none yet fashioned, (Ezek. 16. 7.) no affection to Christ, no principle of grace. The day will come when they shall be spoken for; when the chosen shall be called, shall be courted for Christ, by the ministers, the friends of the Bridegroom. A blessed day it will be, a day of visitation! What shall we do, in that day, to promote the match, to conquer their coyness, and persuade them to consent to Christ, and present themselves chaste virgins to him? Note, Those that through grace are brought to Christ themselves, should contrive what they may do to help others to him, to carry on the great design of his gospel, which is to espouse souls to Christ, and convert sinners to him from whom they have diverted.

2. Christ soon determines what to do in this case, and his spouse agrees with him in it; (v.9.) If she be a wall, if the good work be once begun with the Gentiles, with the souls that are to be called in, if the little sister, when she shall be spoken for by the gospel, will but receive the word, and build herself upon Christ the Foundation, and frame her doings to turn to the Lord, as the wall is in order to the house, we will build upon her a palace of silver, or build her up into such a palace; we will carry on the good work that is begun, till the wall becomes a palace, the wall of stone a palace of silver; which goes beyond the boast of Augustus Cæsar, that what he found brick he left marble. This little sister, when once she is joined to the Lord, shall be made to grow into a holy temple, a habitation of God through the Spirit, Eph. 2. 21, 22. If she be a door, when this palace comes to be finished, and the doors of this wall set up, which was the last thing done, (Neh. 7. 1.) then we will enclose her with boards of cedar, we will carefully and effectually protect her, that she shall receive no damage. We will do it; Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, all concur in contriving, carrying on, and crowning the blessed work when the time comes. Whatever is wanting shall be set in order, and the work of faith shall be fulfilled with power. Though the beginnings of grace be small, the latter end shall greatly increase. The church is in care concerning those that are yet uncalled. "Let me alone," says Christ, "I will do all that which is necessary to be done for them. Trust me with it."

3. The spouse takes this occasion to acknowledge with thankfulness his kindness to her, v. 10. She is very willing to trust him with her little sister, for she herself had had great experience of his grace, and, for her part, she owed her all to it; I am a wall, and my breasts like towers. This she speaks, not as upbraiding her little sister that had no breasts, but comforting herself concerning her, that he who had made her what she is, who had built her up upon himself, and made her to grow up to maturity, could and would do the same kindness for those whose case she bore upon her heart; Then was I in his eyes as one that found favour. See,

(1.) What she values herself upon, her having found favour in the eyes of Jesus Christ; those are happy, truly happy, and for ever so, that have the favour of God, and are accepted of him.

(2.) How she ascribes the good work of God in her to the good will of God toward her; "He has made me a wall, and my breasts as towers, and then, in that instance more than in any thing, I experienced his love to me." Hail, thou that art highly favoured, for in thee Christ is formed.

(3.) What pleasure God takes in the work of his own hands. When we are made as a wall, as a brazen wall, (Jer. 1. 18.—15. 20.) that stands firm against the blast of the terrible ones, (Isa. 25. 4.) then God takes delight in us to do good.

(4.) With what joy and triumph we ought to speak of God's grace towards us, and with what satisfaction we should look back upon the special times and seasons when we were in his eyes as those that find favour; these were days never to be forgotten.

II. They are here consulting about a vineyard they had in the country, the church of Christ on earth, considered under the notion of a vineyard; (v. 11, 12.) Solomon had a vineyard at Baal-hamon, had a kingdom in the possession of a multitude, a numerous people. As he was a type of Christ, so his vineyard was a type of the church of Christ. Our Saviour has given us a key to these verses in the parable of the vineyard let out to unthankful husbandmen, Matth. 21. 33. The bargain was, that every one of the tenants having so much of the vineyard assigned him as would contain a thousand vines, he was to pay the annual rent of a thousand pieces of silver; for we read, (Isa. 7. 23.) that in a fruitful soil there were a thousand vines at a thousand silverlings. Observe,

1. Christ's church is his vineyard, a pleasant and peculiar place, privileged with many honours; he delights to walk in it, as a man in his vineyard, and is pleased with its fruits.

2. He has intrusted each of us with this vineyard, as keepers of it; the privileges of the church are that good thing which he has committed to us, to be kept as a sacred trust; the service of the church is to be our business, according as our capacity is; Son, go work to-day in my vineyard. Adam, in innocency, was to dress the garden, and to keep it.

3. He expects rent from those that are employed in his vineyard, and intrusted with it. He comes, seeking fruit, and requires gospel-duty of all those that enjoy gospel-privileges. Every one, of what rank or degree soever, must bring glory and honour to Christ, and do some service to the interest of his kingdom in the world, in consideration of what benefit and advantage they enjoy by their share of the privileges of the vineyard.

4. Though Christ has let out his vineyard to keepers, yet still it is his, and he has his eye always upon it for good; for if he did not watch over it night and day, (Isa. 27. 1, 2.) the watchmen, to whom he has let it out, would keep it but in vain, Ps. 127. 1. Some take these for Christ's words; (v. 12.) My vineyard, which is mine, is before me; and they observe how he dwells upon his propriety in it; It is my vineyard, which is mine; so dear is his church to him, it is his own in the world, (John, 13. 1.) and therefore he will always have it under his protection; it is his own, and he will look after it.

5. The church, that enjoys the privileges of the vineyard, must have them always before her; the keeping of the vineyard requires constant care and diligence. They are rather the words of the spouse; My vineyard, which is mine, is before me. She had lamented her fault and folly in not keeping her own vineyard,

(ch. 6.) but now she resolves to reform. Our hearts are our vineyards, which we must keep with all diligence; and therefore we must have a watchful jealous eye upon them at all times.

6. Our great care must be to pay our rent for what we hold of Christ's vineyard, and to see that we do not go behind-hand, nor disappoint the messengers he sends to receive the fruits; (Matth. 21. 34.) Thou, O Solomon, must have a thousand, and shalt have. The main of the profits belong to Christ; to him and his praise all our fruits must be dedicated.

7. If we be careful to give Christ the praise of our church-privileges, we may then take to ourselves the comfort and benefit of them. If the Owner of the vineyard has had his due, the keepers of it shall be well-paid for their care and pains; they shall have two hundred, which sum, no doubt, was looked upon as good profit. They that work for Christ are working for themselves, and shall be unspeakable gainers by it.

13. Thou that dwellest in the gardens, the companions hearken to thy voice: cause me to hear it.
14. Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like to a roe or to a young hart upon the mountains of spices.

Christ and his spouse are here parting for a while; she must stay below in the gardens on earth, where she has work to do for him, he must remove to the mountains of spices in heaven, where he has business to attend for her, as an Advocate with the Father. Now observe with what mutual endearments they part:

1. He desires to hear often from her; she is ready at her pen, she must be sure to write to him, she knows how to direct it; (v. 13.) "Thou that, for the present, dwellest in the gardens, dressing and keeping them till thou remove from the garden below to the paradise above; thou, O believer, whoever thou art, that dwellest in the gardens of solemn ordinances, in the gardens of church-fellowship and communion, the companions are so happy as to hear thy voice, cause me to hear it too."

Observe, (1.) Christ's friends should keep a good correspondence one with another, and, as dear companions, speak often to one another, (Mal. 3. 16.) and hearken to one another's voice; they should edify, encourage, and respect, one another. They are companions in the kingdom and patience of Christ, and therefore, as fellow-travellers, should keep up mutual freedom, and not be shy of, or strange to, one another. The communion of saints is an article of our covenant, as well as an article of our creed; to exhort one another daily, and be glad to be exhorted one by another. Hearken to the voice of the church, as far as it agrees with the voice of Christ; his companions will do so.

(2.) In the midst of our communion with one another, we must not neglect our communion with Christ, but let him see our countenance, and hear our voice; he here bespeaks it; "The companions hearken to thy voice, it is a pleasure to them; cause me to hear it. Thou makest thy complaints to them when any thing grieves thee; why dost thou not bring them to me, and let me hear them? Thou art free with them; be as free with me, pour out thy heart to me." Thus Christ, when he left his disciples, ordered them to send to him upon every occasion; Ask, and ye shall receive. Note, Christ not only accepts and answers, but even courts, his people's prayers, not reckoning them a trouble to him, but an honour and a delight, Prov. 15. 8. We cause him to hear our prayers, when we not only pray, but wrestle and strive in prayer. He loves to be pressingly importuned, which is not the manner of men. Some read it, "Cause me to be heard; thou hast often an opportunity of speaking to thy companions, and they hearken to what thou sayest; speak of me to them, let my name be heard among them, let me be the subject of thy discourse." "One word of Christ," (as Archbishop Usher used to say.) "before you part." No subject is more becoming, or should be more pleasing.

2. She desires his speedy return to her; (v. 14.) Make haste, my Beloved, to come again, and receive me to thyself; be thou like a roe, or a young hart, upon the mountains of spices; let no time be lost; it is pleasant dwelling here in the gardens, but to depart and be with thee is far better; that therefore is it I wish, and wait, and long for. Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Observe,

(1.) Though Jesus Christ be now retired, he will return. The heavens, those high mountains of sweet spices, must contain him, till the times of refreshing shall come; and those times will come, when every eye shall see him, in all the pomp and power of the upper and better world; the mystery of God being finished, and the mystical body completed.

(2.) True believers, as they are looking for, so they are hastening to, the coming of that day of the Lord; not that they would have him make more haste than good speed, but that the intermediate counsels may all be fulfilled, and then that the end may come—the sooner, the better. Not that they think him slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness, but thus they express the strength of their affections to him, and the vastness of their expectations from him when he comes again.

(3.) Those only that can in sincerity call Christ their Beloved, their Best-Beloved, can, upon good grounds, desire him to hasten his second coming. As for those whose hearts go a whoring after the world, and who set their affections on the things of the earth, they cannot love his appearing, but dread it rather, because then the earth, and all the things of it, which they have chosen for their portion, will be burnt up: but they that truly love Christ, long for his second coming, because it will be the crown both of his glory and their bliss.

(4.) The comfort and satisfaction which we sometimes have in communion with God in grace here, should make us breathe the more earnestly after the immediate vision, and complete fruition, of him in the kingdom of glory. The spouse, after an endearing conference with her Beloved, finding it must break off, concludes with this affectionate request for the perfecting and perpetuating of this happiness in the future state. The clusters of grapes, that meet us in this wilderness, should make us long for the full vintage in Canaan. If a day in his courts be so sweet, what then will an eternity within the veil be! If this be heaven, Oh that I were there!

(5.) It is good to conclude our devotions with a joyful expectation of the glory to be revealed, and holy humble breathings towards it. We should not part but with the prospect of meeting again. It is good to conclude every sabbath with thoughts of the everlasting sabbath, which shall have no night at the end of it, nor any week-day to come after. It is good to conclude every sacrament with thoughts of the everlasting feast, when we shall sit down with Christ at his table in his kingdom, to rise no more, and drink of the wine new there; and to break up every religious assembly, in hopes of the general assembly of the church of the first-born, when time and days shall be no more. Let the blessed Jesus hasten that blessed day. Why are his chariot-wheels so long a coming? Why tarry the wheels of his chariots?
